

culturing a book of poems

© 2023 by culturing

All rights reserved

This book may be printed for personal use
All other reproduction is prohibited

Contents

May 2011	11
The man who knows	11
March 2014	12
Birth	12
April 2014	13
Perspicuity (For Example)	13
July 2014	14
Song of Sophia	14
May 2015	16
Romance Revisited	16
July 2015	18
I have wandered streets	18
Inner Harbor	19
There are no words	20
There is too much noise	21
October 2015	22
Fragments Shored Against Ruin	22
January 2016	26
Scents of the Divine	26
The Choir	27
August 2016	29
Valediction to Images	29
September 2016	30
Another ending	30
Child you are the water	31
Only Begin	32
October 2016	33
A poem	33
Longing	34
April 2017	35
Countrified	35

The Bird in the Glue Trap	36
The New Science	37
The New World	38
 October 2017	 39
Out came a cry	39
 April 2018	 40
A walk through a graveyard	40
Aftermath	41
The Secrets of Country Living	42
 August 2018	 43
Mysteries	43
 November 2018	 44
One More Cave	44
“Romance Revisited,” revisited	45
 January 2019	 46
Nixon at the Threshold of the Lincoln Memorial	46
 March 2019	 47
I have withdrawn from the world	47
Rosie	48
 May 2019	 49
The Lady	49
 June 2019	 50
Crickets	50
 July 2019	 51
White Shade	51
 August 2019	 52
Lady in the Dark	52
Lady in the Temple	53
Lincoln’s Memory	54
 September 2019	 57
After Lincoln	57
Tradition	59
 April 2020	 60

Homecoming	60
September 2020	61
The Enduring and Unchanging Dao	61
February 2021	62
Planting Time	62
April 2021	63
The wind in the leaves	63
May 2021	64
What we find by singing	64
July 2021	65
Old House	65
September 2021	66
Making Sausage	66
Wandering Sheep	67
October 2021	68
Lost Forest	68
November 2021	69
Beyond Power	69
Shattered Image, Fallen Breast	70
December 2021	71
Phenomenology of Science	71
January 2022	72
Words	72
March 2022	73
Phalanx of Mind	73
Saving Earth	74
Who is in charge here	75
April 2022	76
After Reagan	76
Far Away	77
Technology	78
The Winds of Change	79
Things Themselves	80

Unauthorized thinking	81
May 2022	82
Electricity	82
Streets I Never Knew	83
What calls for poetry?	84
June 2022	85
Fading Feeling	85
Let Go	86
Light	87
Lyceum	88
Mulch by the Scoop	89
Myth at Twilight	90
Science and Technology	91
Virgin Queens	92
July 2022	93
A Platonist declares	93
Beatific Visions	94
Belly of the Whale	95
Emerge	97
Industrial Man	98
Liberty and Justice	100
Near Mountains	101
Reasonable Measure	102
Socrates and Confucius	103
Theodicy	104
Who are they?	105
August 2022	106
Aletheian	106
At Sea	107
Craftsman	109
Feet of Rain	110
Hitler's Bunker	111
Lady in the Rain	112
Mingled Being	113
On this rock	114
Such Surprises Must Be	115
The Ground is Lava	116
The New Frontier	117
Thinking Deeply	118
Too Playful	119

September 2022	120
Afterthought on the Romantics	120
Gettysburg	121
Old Flames	123
One of Us	124
Over the Atlantic	125
Sandcastles	126
October 2022	127
All Silence	127
As Ever	128
No Reason	129
Risible Time	130
Time	131
November 2022	132
After Tomorrow	132
It is not for me	133
No Entry Beyond	134
Thing in Progress	135
The Gospel According to Us	136
Untested Ways	137
No Will to Deceive	138
Uncertain Times	139
After "A Late Walk" by Robert Frost	140
Freedom's End	141
Persuasion	142
Darkness Becomes You	143
History	144
Crimson Days in the Depths of Time	145
In Any Case	146
Ave Maris Stella	147
Why Reason?	148
Hegel	149
December 2022	150
Back to the Mines	150
Why Obey?	151
You Are The Way	152
To Tell This To You, or Changing of the Gods	153
Spring Cleaning	154
Vortex Afterglow	155
Compromise	156

Marxists	157
In Memory	158
January 2023	159
Elite Waters	159
Horizons	160
Slumber Much Better	161
Specimens	162
Wait For Another	163
Think Not Absolutely	164
As Like May Yet Be	165
Sick With Struggle	166
Strangers	167
February 2023	168
Emptiness That None Can Understand	168
Rest Unassured	169
Nutrition by Faith Alone	170
Dwindle	171
The Promise of the Lady	172
Like No Angel	173
A more tolerant order	174
Night Sweats of the American Dream	175
The Quest for the Immortal Self	176
The Sound a Plant Makes	177
March 2023	178
Ahura Mazda (the Question Remains)	178
The Throne of Cyrus	179
Come Again	180
The Drums of Alexander	181
Small All the Same	182
Unfriendly	183
The Realm of Reason	184
So Very Greek	185
Larger Accomplishments (Pragmatism)	186
As She Will	187
Not even sure who to ask	188
Saving Daylight	189
Plain and True	190
April 2023	191
At Eleusis	191
If he would speak today	192

Some Natures	193
What time is this	194
On Whose Authority	195
Sources	196
The Question of Democracy	197
Something About Plato	198
Who are we?	199
culmination	200
The Way of the Night	201
Little Bird	202
Good Eyes	203
Untold Misery	204
Wallow	205
Duty	206
Some Other	207
The Protestant	208
Contrition	209
The Scientist	210
Stop the Bombing	211
Monotheism	212
Menagerie of Rules	213
The Thin Veil	214
They May Be Right	215
Where They Can See You	216
Wait, Think, Speak	217
 June 2023	 218
Banishing Night	218
Eudaimonia	219
Some Men	220
Rolling Waves	221
Corporate Man	222
Habits	223
Uncivilized After All These Years	224
Pain That One Calls Home	225
Saying New Sayings	226
Both How and Why	227
Ideal Republic	228
Flying Lessons	229
No Single Force	230
Dreams	231
Better Judgment	232
What Surprises Remain	233

Blank Space	234
July 2023	235
Wouldnt it be nice	235
Clarity is like Death	236
Inexorably Ever After	237
Spiraling	238
This Way Forever	239
In the depths of it	240
Bind	241
Moldy Thinking	242
To Even Have a Dream	243
I have known women	244
A Raid on Delphi	245
Arrival	246
In the Field	247
Where it Belongs	248
The House of the Dead	249
August 2023	251
In this hour of wakening	251
We were always at war with nature	252
Leave Me	253
Westward Ticket	254
Sources II	255
With Great Justice	256
All Those Ages Ago	257
Trust or Freedom	258
Hitler's Grave	259
September 2023	260
Through All Our Fears	260
Rapt Futility	261
Walking the Line	262
That which wants to be said	263
Kennedy's Peace	264
A Typical Day	265
We Silly Mammals	266
Strangeness of the Ordinary	267
Submission in Disguise	268
Someone Tell Wittgenstein	269
Through the Horizon	270

15 May 2011

The man who knows
knows he doesn't know
and loves to sing to sing,

because as water flows and flows
he can't control a thing.

Birth

05 March 2014

Birth is a slow and painful thing,
a tumult,
longing toward an end,
but staggering,
a shallow wake
of nascence,

For which death doth rend.

Perspicuity (For Example)

14 April 2014

Note the indiscriminate vortices
which haphazardly coax the vector
into misalignment,

Or the malignantly languorous
koala supping on divinities.

Song of Sophia

24 July 2014

I. Akrasia

When there were no depths, I was brought forth,
When there were no springs abounding with water.

Time slipped, fell through black holes
to where I dwelt,

Stillborn in a rotting womb,
with histories untold.

I cut my own cord.

Day by day I played between Olympian plains
and Horeb,

Learning nothing,

For the ground had been well-tread
by tanks and wise men
teaching shadows

*HEY
THIS JUST IN HEY
ERECTILE
DYSFUNCTION
HEY
LOOK KITTENS
HEY
BIKINIS
HEY
HAVE YOU SEEN
HEY
YOU THERE ??
HEY
I LOVE YOU.*

*HEY
LOVE ME <3
HEY*

II. Nostoi

Does not wisdom cry out,
And understanding lift up her voice?

Thunder roars,
and as a man who pants for water
sees the rock break,

And sees the streams long dried by drought
begin to flow,
and drinks,

So too I flee the wasteland.

III. Paideia

To you, O men, I call,
and my voice is to the sons of men.

I gaze upon a field grown ripe with wheat
and feel the warmth of rosy-fingered Dawn
who has not failed to rise. I grip the scythe,

And take upon myself beginnings
and their ends, and find this meaning sicut erat in principio.

Romance Revisited

07 May 2015

Unsurprised when she appeared
atop the stair,
unsought and yet on cue,
I smiled.

There we were again.

More than sounds were heard,
more said than words
as we relieved the burn
that itched for all those years.

Something in that breeze
put love at ease,
and all those memories
in Sunday Best conceived
some reparation,
some demand.

But lives diverge,
conform to their courses,
drive towards their ends.

This, then, too must end.

--

But if we flee from time,
abandon all but dreams,

Elide the pulls of Jupiter
and Venus,

Would we weary of the world we'd made?

Must immortal Love's embrace ignore all time and place?

--

Rage for futility,
Rage for bleared horizons,

For rage itself,
which vanquishes sages,
and for the mortal dream.

But though to many moons I've sighed,
and though those eyes when met with mine still come to life to think of all that was
and what could be, it is not time.

Though it is right.

For time flows suddenly to exit youth.

--

Let us go then, you and I,
to die, and not trace ways
across that sky
where the Immortals lie.

We belong implanted
where the bloom that Spring provides by Autumn flees, and we get by on hardened leaves.

20 July 2015

I have wandered streets,
Each entrance blocked by blood of lamb,
And I have seen no faces.

These are empty places.

Inner Harbor

04 July 2015

I spend my days inside,
my nights beside the water
watching young things draw and quarter
lives not yet their own.

This they call maturity,
this ever lack-of-surety,
to be out on my own, be big
but still not fill the throne.

26 July 2015

There are no words --
no words, but only sounds
with no meaning.

Is there a balm?
What is a balm?

Nowhere are we to find solace.
Nowhere are we to find others
without lawlessness,

And I know why the free bird sings,
for lack of a cage,
for lack of any air on which to glide.

15 July 2015

There is too much noise
inside, between walls,
reverberating through skulls

Which grow empty.

Is there not solace, rest
from Self?

Is there a balm?

I have heard of places,
heard tunes of theogony,
but is there any calm?

What remains are ashes,
What remains are gems?

And must we know the difference?

I've yet to stumble through Eden
but I've heard her song,
I've seen blossoms rise.

If there is a balm, it lies behind still-naked eyes.

Fragments Shored Against Ruin

24 October 2015

1

You are the last fighting chance
for yourself,

A chamber, a kingdom
-- Cordelia!

Where is the throne?
What is flesh?

A clock in the hall
A clock and no walls

And spinning
Rome is burning

Tick Tick Tick --

There are things that move the will
that even the atom cannot kill --

There are things there are things

-- If you do not control yourself,
who will?

2

The executive has surrendered
all -- anarchy ensues.

The state in which one cannot say no,
when one cannot stop,
is called chaos today is chaos
and we are revolving in kaleidoscope houses that looked fun

who am the last fighting chance for myself, the only opportunity to be free of that doggerel wretch

who sits on the mind-throne

while, usurped, the executive wastes
in heaps of sentiment and flesh
that wash over all
and bathe with the lime of body.

soma. soma soma soma
take and live.

3

My body waffling through space
and undigested time conceives Idea -- floats, as it were, above itself
into ethereal otherlands

and waits.

Up, from where is only down,
I fly, and divide this self into slivers, abandoning each at the foot of age-old Mind

Who takes them, warping tomorrow
with hands of iron, cold.

I am left unanswered.

4

I fear the smallness of my mind
surrounded by mysteries,

The abstract cave,
philosopher's chains
unbroken,

Bound,
and sinking down.

And are there here no sunbeams,
no exalted forms that dance

on more than cavewall?

5

There are no tunes or strings to play
unbloodied by the rage, unbridled
by fearful faces, names turned dusty with shame.

How far the sky has fallen,
how far! deep within our bowels

We cannot digest
or swallow.

There is only us -- only the rage
and the cold, swollen cage.
The bruised age.

6

Listen. We will begin to repeal soporifics
only in the light of more pure harmonies and form.

There can be no freedom in extravagance.

Love is the beginning but not the fruition,
which comes only through discipline
and a kind of violence.

Once we have established ourselves
at the end of ourselves, and only then,
can we draw from the ashes
some kind of beginning.

7

Is there still a Song,
and can I sing along?

This man, boy, heart beating hard and strong,
'tis mine? And may I be wrong?

I have wallowed verily, wallowed long in the avenues and twisting ways
of ecstasy and sorrow,

But there is forthcoming joy,
awakened noise which learns to balance
and to hope with poise

The truth of which is There is There is There.

Scents of the Divine

14 January 2016

Wonder is the pollen of belief,
and faith, the leaf;

We know only wafts
of distant breezes.

The Choir

18 January 2016

By silent seas we sit and sing
Of life's unwrought enamelling
As each day gathers into storm
And reasons with our untold ire.

Rise fair song and banish woe
For we must fear the foreman's blow
For though our fathers built with stone
We build the world again each morn,

And tremble in the shade of steel,
And ache for poison salesmen sell,
And whirl in this ungrateful gyre
To placate pioneering fire.

--

What is this? What is my own?
What good is a peopled home
When urge and urge and urge inspire
Epitomes forlorn?

Hope, where are your lovely feathers?
All your crumbs are swept -- this weathered Leaf deceives -- these grasses wither.
There are only bog and mire.

Who would dare to ope
Pandora's vessel once again? What's left?
All can see that Zeus has scorned
Those Foresight has adorned.

--

But summon those old voices hither.
Sing a song against the dither.
Won't a mythic world reborn Reclassify revealed desire?

Make again that age-old beat.
Forget the words that spell defeat.

Abandon prod and thrust.
Embrace the courage of the calling horn.

For we have feared the shades of steel,
But harbor dreams of living well,
And dream of lifting off the pyre,
And lift this chorus as a choir.

Valediction to Images

06 August 2016

Image of forgotten beauty,
Face of fire, flesh of music,
Laughter-loving Aphrodite,
Be not high or mighty
 By the altar of my heart.

Rosy cheeks on satin faces,
Eyes that call the heart to race,
O, sculpture of amazing graces,
Shatter. There are empty places
 Deep within my heart.

Come instead, you hidden song,
You dying fall withholding all,
And I will hear you long,
For I can hear you call
 From deep within the altar of my heart.

Another ending

22 September 2016

I guess this is the end.
I'm not sure what of.
They say time is no friend.
Things slip away.

I guess it must be so.
But how should we know?
Something moves about,
and I can hear it rumble now.

So I write this down.
Embark with me I pray.
Other thoughts have flown,
or gone some other way,

But within is the promised stay of woe,
and that is where the old roads go.

22 September 2016

Child you are the water -- have you heard?
It trickles softer words.
Don't be tricked by desert people.
Fear the curse of birds.

Only Begin

22 September 2016

For J. Alfred Prufrock and his admirers

If I could only begin,
I would end alright.
But time is riddled with sin.

Lovers never win
with all their might.
If I could only begin

To tell you all of thick and thin
I might get things right.
But time is riddled with sin.

So let me come in,
up out of this night.
Then I could begin

To speak in both sound and sight
of ample groves and measured flight.
But time is riddled with sin,
so I could only begin.

A poem

28 October 2016

begins like this:
a note, a phrase,

But then goes deeper,
seeps just under,
slakes upon a thirst,

and ends in growth.

Longing

17 October 2016

I long for things I've never known.
The shadows curse my eyes.
The scars run deep. They run at least to bone.

And though thunder grants atonement,
Always questions come from other skies.
I long for things I've never known,

And candles burn and scholars moan
And ashes creep beneath the tightest mind.
The scars are deep like bone,

And all the ancient empty tomes
Provide no lasting prize,
But only point to things we cannot know.

The ache for bluer skies,
The ache for home,
The scars that run through bone,
The longing is the only thing we know.

Countrified

06 April 2017

I have heard the wail of cities,
I have felt their steely cry,
And I have prowled upon the pavement
And been burned from eye to eye.

I cannot hate the people
Who have known no other way,
But I don't think their crippling must darken my own day.

The Bird in the Glue Trap

06 April 2017

It wasn't meant for you, that much is clear. But how those little wings beat such a fearsome rhythm
just to pull you
those two-hundred bird-lengths,
sticky trap in tow,
I'll never know,

Or how you ripped your body free
to soar on lighter wing.

Ah, those feathers left behind
were not worth dying over.

I am only glad, my friend,
that I did not extinguish you
to put an end to pain.

The New Science

06 April 2017

Under the stars a hundred bards
drop still, dead silent,
to look for a law in the cards.

They know the stomach is violent,
a flame that retards,

And also that men have bodies,
are bodies, whirling
in an endless whirl of leaves.

Therefore they crucify Reason,
that cold Inspector
who murders the seasons,

And go on unvarnished
but do not think that makes them tarnished.

Can we place blame
for this treason?

Might it be just
that in spite of stars
Man hasn't come that far?

The New World

25 April 2017

Raised among wolves,
we've learned both bite and howl,
but there is a new kind of life coming now.

An old life more truly,
one ought to be sure.
Allow me to answer, I've no sinecure.

Upon an old hill
there stood men young and old.
They bore a fierce wind and were bold.

As one with one purpose
they built there together
foundations to outlast all weather.

That edifice fell,
but the ruins remain.
Do any dare build there again?

16 October 2017

Out came a cry
from beneath the great Nothing,
but no one was there to believe it.

An oomph went woomph,
and the meaning went missing,
and no one was there to retrieve it.

And day was like sand,
and the moon went away,
and nobody was there to be free with.

01 April 2018

A walk
through a graveyard
reveals a peculiar slumber —

the men of tomorrow.

The sign reads “Help,
we’ve been civilized,
there’s no going back.”

But there never has been any going back.

And the life urge resigns itself
to smallness,
and this too is good,

For too much growth makes weeds,
and we cannot tolerate weeds.

Tomorrow, then, comes anyway.
This is a walk through a graveyard.

Aftermath

21 April 2018

I have heard the wild
ramblings,
felt betrayed by man
and steel,
and I cannot keep on good clothes –

but madly naked
run through city streets,
cry “Kung Fu Tze!
where are you?”

The Secrets of Country Living

21 April 2018

For Robert Penn Warren

I do not know what

you will find up there in the brambles
among inhibiting growths,

but I have once
heard an eagle call out its name.

It was a sound like Truth.

Mysteries

01 August 2018

O stolen time,
wandering there by the sea,

what will you do with me?

Unfurl your grasp of life,
make plain the age again!

No sooner does one cope
than some new younger hope
steps in and whisks fidelity away.

O vanity of vanities,
great necromancing age!

Tear down thy veils with rage
if that will set you free,

but I will not be free.

For there is still truth in old books,
and the walls will not fall for sly looks.

Indeed, there is room at all tables.

09 November 2018

When Philosophy's just one more Cave, take heart,
for there is still room to start,
and an almost but not yet lost art.

"Romance Revisited," revisited

14 November 2018

I saw you there
atop the stair,
it's true,

And you were me
and I was you,

And ocean blue
bore love away.

It chastened him right through.

Alas! they say
it is no use to sing,

But I'll take wing, for lo!
Minerva's owl has perched
upon a husk, a lifeless stump,

and there will be no going on without new songs from flesh and blood.

Nixon at the Threshold of the Lincoln Memorial

13 January 2019

Something that is completely clean can also be completely sterile

- Richard Nixon, Dictabelt 75, May 1970

What language could there have been between that tiger, battle-scarred,
and these young cubs, German-tongued
and fearful offspring of Philosophy in ruins?

Ah, one tries to merge with Being as the sky collapses.
Those with thorny crowns spy deep oppression.

Nixon mutters, "What is there to save?"
allows no motion, grins a grin that says
"All shall be well, stop feeling."

This has happened before.

I stood there as a child
repeating "up steps!" in innocence,
for I had not yet learned what there is said
of History or Freedom,
or the other vague ideas men have died for.

I was born too late for that,
and though things have not changed
some hope, yes, even now,
though with less force,
for some renewal,
this time unendorsed.

It will not come on wings
or save us, probably,
but it could make things better,
keep them moving.

And as for the children, well,
they've never mattered much to us,
and who could build a home from such raw material?

27 March 2019

I have withdrawn from the world
for the world's own good,
I have bound my own hands.

But not with the usual cords
and knots,
not well-fashioned marriage bands.

I come for the darkness,
and whisper it slow:
that this is where all the young tulips go

Which have failed to grow
in dead soil.

—

Whence comes new song,
and will it be long?

The embers are dwindling,
the hearth has grown cold,
and the vagabonds grow old.

I say only this,
that is this not sure bliss,
to belong, to behold, and to bless?

Rosie

31 March 2019

Rosie works
so hard
to please the factory man.

It is a matter of time.

She has been on hands and knees
since seventeen,

And does not know
what moves her so,

To longing, maybe, for something.

Meanwhile
somewhere blossoms,

but she cannot go,
for it is a matter of time,

though she does know
the way things grow.

The Lady

06 May 2019

I dreamed I saw a Lady
perched atop a milk-white stair, overlooking starry oceans
and defining what was there.

Beneath her golden tresses
opened up a gnawing void,
which catapulted us to freedom.
Soon all motion was destroyed!

The Lady did not stir, but crooned,
and smiled a softer smile
than wisest men have dared to dream.
Then she turned her back awhile.

The void kept belching fire,
and the only thing we knew
was its bedevilment and whirl.
It proved that all things are see-through!

The Lady meanwhile, laughing, stayed atop of how things are,
and by the time we knew what hit us,
saw we hadn't gotten far.

The morning came as always,
and we, naked on her shore,
cried out, "Dear Lady, let us near!
Your sweet forgiveness, we implore!"

She looked at all our nakedness,
saw through our praise and plight,
and said, "Fools, get yourselves together,
or else get out of my sight!"

Crickets

28 June 2019

Up upon a hill I heard
the crickets chirping words:
O boy, come here, come near,
and stay and talk awhile.

My answer was to smile,
and I did no more favors then,
but crossed the valley of denial
and arrived within their ken.

O boy, I heard more echoing,
and sat, and stayed, and then felt all around a queer commotion
stir the leaves, and break, and end.

And oh, 'twas cool November,
and the birds did softly sing,
and if there's one thing I'll remember,
it's my softly taking wing

Upon the backs of those cold crickets,
on the hill, who chirped with words,
for as they chirped about salvation,
they made sure that I had heard.

White Shade

07 July 2019

A shade of white,
not quite opaque,
disturbs my sight.

It has no form,
but haunts the night
like one unsteadily born.

The ashes of a pyre lay where
She was burned bright.

I do not see the Lady,
and her absence
haunts my sight.

Lady in the Dark

03 August 2019

Beneath the moon
I saw her too,

alone,
where null is true.

I did not dare come near,
but felt that here, of all
damned places,
least deserves her.

Lady in the Temple

10 August 2019

She looked around like one bound to be free,

excited truly,
and so rapt
that she saw none
of the holes in the roof.

Lincoln's Memory

29 August 2019

So favored forms of power
shall not perish from the earth,
would you please sing for us, O History,
about the urgent birth
of these great, terrible, united States,
which, though conceived in Liberty,
did break, some say, that vow?

This nation under God, twice founded,
ever failing, yet immortal,
did embark toward the dream of Freedom
led by that one stout Kentuckian
who hated much as loved
and took a promise unfulfilled
and made it law to bind on all.

This promise, called Equality,
our hope in days to come,
arose, O History! through violence,
and herein lies its song.

--

Twas eighteen-fifty-eight, whereon a Senate seat contended led the folks of Illinois to dream they saw a President.
One Lincoln-not-yet-Deity, preparing for debate, stood by a portrait of old Jefferson, to whom he could relate,
and said,

"Old predecessor tongue with wings, remind me,
whence came our brave truth,
that all men are created equal.
Knew you this in youth?"

To which the painting said,
"It was a growth of many years,
first born on England's hills
in faithful regicide."

And Lincoln asked,
"But had you heard of man's first disobedience

and the fruit?"

Came quick reply:

"Our Massachusetts friends knew of such things,
but I did hope to purge all superstition,
and robe God in Nature."

"Ah, in nature," Lincoln said.

"That's right. For all can become noble
if they're only left alone."

Great Lincoln, growing pond'rous, stroked his chin
and paced before the painting,
murmuring, "If left alone..."

He did not dare to broach the question,
burned on his and other minds,
of Slavery, but rather urged this thought:
"Suppose we find all men not equal. Who's at fault?"

But there was no reply.

The painting would not speak,
and Lincoln found his affirmation.

As the sureness grew,
he pondered long
and nursed a budding song.

--

This Lincoln after many years appeared before the dead
and spoke the words
we will not long remember,

for we must not hallow,
must not consecrate that ground
where many died and killed.

Thus Lincoln willed,
and thus we must obey.

--

But Oh, how Declaration
had sent shocks across the sea
as Mr. Jefferson endeavored to give ground to that new plea
which was come forth just then,
at last!

And when 'twas time for tea in Boston,
there was Paine in every head,
and 'twas ideas, sir, ideas!
which would leave so many dead.

--

Lord, such war and terror
bled from North down through the South
until the only ones remaining banished God and punished doubt.

To devastation wrought,
and to the horror not quite heeded,

To man's ultimate obedience,
friend History, give song.

After Lincoln

24 September 2019

Alas, there came more wars,
at least as brutal,
oddly spirited,

And Lincoln, growing old,
was placed on coins, enshrined in brooding stone
for all to see and know.

And speakers came
and went, the tanks
went on parade,
and progress dreams
were sung, and listen, listen,
you there, listen,
but don't listen for too long,

because too many have got stuck there
and we may have got it wrong.

--

Wrong and wrong and wrong.
Must we go back to 1619?

Cease your wailing, History!
That brutal, trifling song!

--

If back we go, then back,
but all the way,
past slaves and ships
to Milton, Christ, and Socrates,
as Lincoln surely knew.

And History, sweet Dame,
it's true, we cannot quarrel long,

But oh, your song, your song!
it will need rearranging before long.

Tradition

25 September 2019

I think the future
does not belong to the past,
and things are passing,
present and future.

I think things will not last;
though nothing does,
those less than most
which grow from baseless ground,

things passing all around,
and we do well to grasp
for any which are present,
future or past,

those most the old things
which are known to last.

Homecoming

22 April 2020

*Awaking comes in turns,
the day is bright before it burns.*

I walk down streets I never knew.
They are familiar, but I, the knower, have changed.
I did not know what little I knew.
Maybe this is what poets mean by recurrence,
why they return so often to the same things.
I did not know the familiar streets
because I, the knower, had not yet been changed.
But what can bring such a change?
An encounter, a question, another knower?
To know is to be known and vice versa.
This means the streets must know me,
and where the streets have no names
there is nothing to know.
But this is all begging the question,
why knowledge?
Because I, the knower, have not yet been changed.
Maybe this is why poets recur and recur.
If change comes it comes only for now, not forever,
and so I walk down streets I never knew,
the same streets, but I, the knower, have changed,
and so have they.

The Enduring and Unchanging Dao

14 September 2020

People die, new people are born.
The timbre of civilization changes,
like always, and we, those merely progenitors,
progenerate, again, at the horn.

What beast,
what rough or otherwise, comes forth
to taste the light of day?

This surely is no newer way
than all the old ways,
dying, dead, or buried.

So what special hurry?

Those come forth go under,
this is so, and temple shrouds,
once rent asunder, can be made,
remade, again, again.

If vanity, then vanity.
The proposition's chord
strikes hard, and oh,
we grow so bored.

What light from yonder room?

'Tis Juliet? Nay, knave, just one once loved
in some forgotten tongue.

I say be such that every longing touch
remembers love,

But do step cautiously
through darkened rooms,
and listen for that horn.

Planting Time

14 February 2021

In the spring time of the year,
as dawn rises, dusty, over the fields,
I wait, anxious, with my plow.

It has come again, the time for planting,
but this crop is strange to me.
The soil is like all soil, firm but supple,
and I am like all planters,
firm but supple.

Tomorrow rains will come,
and old seed wash away
as new seed takes its root,

And who will then be standing here in planters' shoes
to cast a growing shadow?

I hope one who knows a little,
treads with greater care.

For people in the village,
I plant days and years

And see strange fruit come harvest time.
I wait for what will grow.

The wind in the leaves

13 April 2021

Thunders crash,
The wind moves through the leaves,

The paths grow walls,
curve into cages,

Thunder asks,
A certain volume of man,
suffices?

No, it never suffices,

Always more
past overflowing

Thunder crashes,
Floods tear down the trees,

The wind moves through the leaves,
A certain volume of man,
so certain

Thunder, why
O thunder

move through wind and leaves.

What we find by singing

07 May 2021

Power brings its many blessings,
Though it comes by other names.
This is what we find by singing.

Days were young and love did sting us.
All young people feel the same.
They mix themselves with power's blessings.

Some find laurels, others cling
To lovely children's games.
Thus they lose themselves in singing,

Thus they fall before the morning,
Thus they are to blame.
But power brings them such mixed blessings,

Power puts off dark of dying,
Power's light must wane.
Therefore, find thyself in singing,

Make thine own some other name,
And know I feel the same,
Because this power mixes life with blessings.
This is what we find by singing.

Old House

09 July 2021

I walk down old avenues,
aware again of impermanence,
perennial friend of the weary,
and stop before the family house.

What otherworldly dominion is this,
where manflesh met with womanflesh
to make me?

Yet other worlds must be,
or else our high anxiety
is treason of another kind.

It asks us, whence these beams,
this wood, this angled frame
with memories of forest?

What cold river brought us here?
If not the Thames, the Mississippi?
Say the Susquehanna, rolling slow.

And yet, don't answer.
Let me linger here, and grieve,
until our waters are surpassed.

Old house made new,
another world's anxieties
are haunting you.

Making Sausage

13 September 2021

The bird has a story.
It sounds like a song.
But I wouldn't worry.
He wouldn't sing long.

The people are coming.
They haven't a care.
The people are stunning.
The bird wouldn't dare.

The people make sausage.
What else could they do?
Their story is ugly,
But this much is true:

The bird has to learn how to live with clipped wings.
Indeed, this may be why he sings.

Wandering Sheep

09 September 2021

Up upon a hill,
the sheep go wandering.

Nearby cars zoom thoroughly
over the highway.

Not a few sheep find themselves
in drivers' seats
at eighty miles-an-hour.

Would they not prefer to graze
on some unfettered hillside,
near the setting sun?

They are still sheep,
though silly ones.

I think that they should think again.
The hillside is still there.
It has not changed.

It grows less full,
but some say
this is part of its purpose.

The cars make terrible noise
where wandering sheep once spoke of pleasing vistas, unknown springs.

Lost Forest

28 October 2021

The bulldozers are out today,
are blazing in what once was forest.

I was in this forest
as a child.

Do the workers know
the sound of crickets here
within leaves, the sound
of song that matches oversong?

I am not sentimental,
for I know it to be earth
becoming earth,
and yet I wonder what earth is,

Because the poets ask, and keep on asking,
though they cannot answer,
for we find the question worthy.

Something in the wind
this time of year
must stir uncertainty.

What shall we ask the bulldozer?
What does it know?

Beyond Power

10 November 2021

If Nietzsche were asked,
"Why power?"

He might reply,
"We grow helpless."

But humans
have always been helpless,
are helpless
for decades at least,
and even then will need food.

What purpose has power,
if not to supply
our infirmities?

Oh, but how free we would be,
to be free, very free!

To not be born of woman,
no more of a people
in time and place.

I beg you, dear reader,
be cautious, and do not embark
on a journey that ends in death.

Shattered Image, Fallen Breast

01 November 2021

At midnight in the basement
of a museum, some forgotten grotto
deep in Mediterranean soil,

I walked slow and silent,
deep in thought,

When lo! the image of a woman,
be it Aphrodite, Juno,
or some other, rose before me.

I came to her side
and noticed lying at her feet
a fallen breast of stone,
hers surely, lying prone,
as though some vandal strove
to make her pure.

I put it back where it belongs,
and held it there,
until her firmness made me sure,

But sure of what,
I do not know.

I thought I could discern
the faintest sigh,
but only she would know
who fills the mind with wonder,

so I wondered
if the earth could be her home,
or if she comes from some far-whispered plane
that only makers know.

Phenomenology of Science

25 December 2021

From Hegel's brain
thou, spluttering,
spreadst thy wings.

Thou art one more mythology,
nothing more.

Thou cannot transcend culture, or fly
as Zeitgeist.

No, thy thinking is primitive, alas,
just like thy body.

So give up the geist.
Make way for some new mode of knowing.

Or rather, some old,
deep-rooted thought, the kind
you were made to destroy.

Words

24 January 2022

The words tumble
down, jumbled,
stumble over
bumps and rumble
into town, past
rows of corn that wonder at the world.

I wonder what the world means.

Someone asks me why I choose these words.
I think these words chose me.

And when they ask directions,
well, I think if words are lost,
then I must find them.

I must guide them.

Phalanx of Mind

07 March 2022

Those Reformers,
in order to flee from imperium,
fell for an earlier vice:

That phalanx of mind
wherein each must stay sturdy or die.

But our world is better equipped for peace.

Though the devil in man
never sleeps.

Oi! must I now know my neighbor?
And how can I, knowing him, sleep?

But were he restrained
by imperium, phalanx, or rights,
love could be,
but alas, he is free.

Therefore,
what will he make of me?

Saving Earth

23 March 2022

We have taken lightning captive,
 we have made the sky our slave
on our relentless quest for vengeance
 on an Earth we cannot save.

If all is lost, then songs
 cannot be sung, and yet
this song goes on, so all must still be found somehow.

If we cannot save Earth,
 can Earth save us?
Or is it not a matter
 of saving, but of trust?

Who is in charge here

08 March 2022

I think I shall spend
the rest of my life
searching
for who is in charge here,

so that I may ask them
where they have been.

After Reagan

03 April 2022

We have been pre-sliced
individually, wrapped in money.

But oh, he was funny, well-spoken, and phony.
A pity so few will remember
the lens of that time,
or look through it to see what might be.

Are we free?

I have heard so much talk about liberty,
so little wondering,
"what does that mean?"
that I wonder,
is Freedom for me?

And does Freedom need me?

Far Away

21 April 2022

There's someone powerful far away,
our voices and our stories claim.
I can't hear what they have to say.

This power haunts us, still in sway,
and in submitting we grow lame.
There's someone powerful far away,

And he insists, so we obey,
with voices tuned, though not the same.
I can't hear what they have to say.

And why obey? All power fades,
as every dying day explains.
There must be powers far away,

And yet, away they stay,
As if we here must give things names.
Alas, if there be powers far away,
what do they have to say?

Technology

12 April 2022

The Word
became machines
and dwelt among us.

The Winds of Change

12 April 2022

I listen for the winds of change,
but hear so many sirens blare.
They tell me it's under control.

Control is such a forceful word,
so I just stand here unaware.
I listen for the winds of change,

Which bring me scents of other places
and, I hope, will take me where
they tell me it's under control.

But now as children age,
so too a people ages and grows bare.
I listen for the winds of change

And see my people, scared.
I wonder what could make them whole.
So I just listen to the winds of change,
and let them have control.

Things Themselves

03 April 2022

Until I met a woman,
and her presence strengthened me,
I did not know that God lives
not in books, as Calvin claims,
but in the world of things themselves.

What mystery lies here
remains to nourish those who care
to take the secret that is there
into a home, and let it steer
the very lives of things themselves.

But can we dwell among
the secret song, the hidden call
of Earth's long fall for the abyss?
We have our churches.
Are they tombs for things themselves?

I think we have to think this through,
for God has been a long time dying,
though he rises from the dead,
and he is not the only one.
We know this too of things themselves.

Unauthorized thinking

30 April 2022

"You'd make me laugh if it wasn't forbidden."

- Waiting for Godot

So I've discovered Plotinus.
Have you never heard?
He has shaped your own words.

He is waiting to meet us,
but don't be absurd.
He would never disturb

Your most serious dogmas,
for me put them there.
What a curious bird.

--

All I want
is mystical union
with the Absolute --

is that too much to ask?

--

Augustine doles out freely
fruits of Temple and Academy with no thought
for the plants on which they grow.

Electricity

02 May 2022

The wires, I think,
house an evil god.

I hear him questioning physis,
doubting that all life lives
of its own volition,

and claiming, instead, for himself,
the sole governorship
of all things.

He who can read the signs
has now not even
the comfort of solitude,

given this god's omnipresence.

I wonder how long it will be before happens some shocking conclusion.

Streets I Never Knew

04 May 2022

I walk,
and keep on walking.

When I am old,
will any of what I have seen
be left standing? Or will it be rubble or, worse still, vapor?
But is that not always
the fate of life, to vanish?
I doubt we could make it permanent,
given that all things are not,
and yet where does it end?
In the place it began,

So I walk,
and I keep on walking.

What calls for poetry?

31 May 2022

She does,
the one
whose voice you know.

Fading Feeling

18 June 2022

In our peculiar way,
we were always ones
striving for form, and by form
we meant something enduring,
unchanging, but how much upheaval
and violence it took to learn how now this striving must change.

For Helen's sake, let us remember
the ways of our fathers,
sea-tossed as they always were,
reaching from darkness
like tentacles on Ocean's floor.

We are like them now, and must be,
having seen once for all the formation of cracks
in the old Greek edifice,

And thus we must not always be,
knowing full well that not every Greek bearing gifts can be trusted, but also that we are not trustworthy either, so long as we think with stiff minds, and that after all this is what Plato meant. But in our peculiar Greek way we are stiff like ones trained for a phalanx,
though soft and bourgeois enough,
not fitting in with ourselves, and not really belonging here either, no better than anywhere--

Thus we must not always be,
we must fade, like a breeze on a soft summer night,
or the call of an eagle near mountains,
and make some new way for the feeling to come.

Let Go

06 June 2022

Wandering, questioning,
as before Dawn,
I am sure of this much:
that we hold our beliefs
far too tightly.

--

I think back,
I think back,
I think back,
but hear only more riveting.

Rosie, poor Rosie,
no place for a woman here.

--

What is the other beginning,
the one without steel-plated Mind,
where things grow as we all know they do?

In the mountains,
I hear baby truths being born.

--

Begin here. Nowhere else.
This is where you were born and will die.

--

A rowdy patron observes: "You had to be there!"
I think this is rather apt, and tell him so,
but what more could I tell him?
He knows what it is to know.

Light

19 June 2022

At a red light,
when there is no cross-traffic,
a silence deepens
like the space between man and God.

How stupid it feels,
to wait for nothing.

According to some theologians,
God occupies space above beings,
and waits for us there,
as the father of light.

But I prefer when the light changes
and things keep moving.

Lyceum

28 June 2022

Aristotle and friends walking amiably
over a concourse of trees
discuss beings, assert that no thing
can both be and not be.
In the next room the Christians,
grown weary of faith, re-learn logic
but treat it like faith. Thus the Schoolmen indogmify plausible maxims,
sit firm and erect in the shade of Lyceum.
Aquinas the only true thinker mourns moanfully.
Science emerges, a novum organon,
a new quest to find what things are,
but old faith, an old cast of mind.
The old school now an archeological find,
remains buried, its questions once answered for all.
But the Germans are not quite convinced,
keep on asking why we are not free
to defy and to blur. After all,
we are protean beings, and know the old stories well.
But what course still remains for those bred by the ruins of Lyceum?
One looking over the shoulder
to Greek or Medieval or Modern models?
Or one looking forward, which has travelled back,
with a prayer of thanksgiving, a new apprehension
for what every thought must lack?

--

In the East Room, Dionysians revel
agnostically, thrilled to find God
scarcely knowable, free from the Categories at last,
but what darkness stirs, waiting to pounce
on those not yet prepared for the mysteries?

Mulch by the Scoop

21 June 2022

I am living in the country again,
back after a long sleep,
and I wonder (at times like this)
what that highway is doing here,
near to the place that sells mulch by the scoop.
It is part of the landscape now
(we forget but have signs to remind us)
though we don't embrace it
where we are all cow, horse, and buggy.
But do we, too, not love machines and their progress?
We use them to market our mulch by the scoop
and to haul it and bring it home,
and to heat those homes and to light them
and to plug in to our wider world.
Yet mulch by the scoop enchants us
with the call of the earth and convenience,
the call of abundance and freedom from pain.
I have known of no earth like this,
unless broadcast by LED lights on a neon sign,
yet my heart knows these things must remain.
We are proffering mulch by the scoop.
Will you come over highways and see?

Myth at Twilight

23 June 2022

Will we ever
be free of the myth
of some craftsman in the sky
wreaking form over all that must shudder?

I shudder to think it,
but over with the rising sun,
I see others who do not think it.

Science and Technology

14 June 2022

I would like to see
science and technology,
like religion, kept separate from government
and the lives of regular people,
who cannot understand
the implications, the power,
the ideas embedded therein,
and are harmed,
who cannot make themselves
from steel, let alone make their world,
and who must let things be.
This means letting them fade.
It's true, science has parts to play,
small ones, since stems
without roots surely wither,
but the point is to till the new soil
'til the new crop comes in.

Virgin Queens

28 June 2022

Nobody can hurt a man more than his wife, except maybe his mother. They simply have more opportunity, knowing where all of the pain points are, because they,
on good days, massage there. That is one kind of love, but another is taking in stride all the pain dealt
by mother and wife, so that all can belong.
After all, only suffering brings us together,
as all women know. They require it.
I've come to remind you of this, so that you,
unlike many, avoid the allure of false dreams,
which would make virgin queens out of maidens.

21 July 2022

A Platonist declares that all is Soul,
but now we doubt it. Rather, we believe in clocks that wind themselves, and Nature too.
But what makes Nature go? We'd love to know,
but still we don't. Though answers sometimes run their course, some questions last forever.
But has no one noticed Plato's chosen mode?
In discourse questions outrank answers
two to one. So when a Platonist declares on any subject, greet him with a question,
see how well he knows his master's teaching.
Yet let's not discard a theory for a worse one.
Ask, who makes the clock? Not I. And then ask: Why?

Beatific Visions

16 July 2022

I doubt those people on television
realize they're dressed like angels,
calling us back to a realm we reject,
and I think it's a bit out of place
to put these hopes in masters of commerce,
when such hopes are sky-born or nothing.
What see we in movie stars anyway?
Billboards, book covers, and internet ads
still elicit our peasant repentance.
What for? For not being divine enough,
same as before, and yet let me explain:
none are holy. You're made it this far,
you must know that by now.

It's amazing, isn't it, just how much thought there has been about everything.

Thereby I wander, but what does it mean to be lost in a place that is lost?
It means everything. Stand here with me and observe that at last
all the cracks in the firmament
outline a God-shaped hole.

We are ready for solid food,
culled from earth,
even that which comes only through violence.

Belly of the Whale

11 July 2022

Consumed by the fool's errand of making life painless,
we could never be bothered to think
along lines that were not predetermined,
defined by the will of the faceless consumers
like us, who ran everything. Speechless,
we floundered through chaos and form,
but from time to time one had to wonder what all of it meant, else succumb to the roar of consumption
enduring through slogans and signs
and most firmly in minds made of mud baked like stone. I was never a part of this,
never aligned with the spineless
who bear no weight, who will crack under any demand,
for demanding betrays their life's purpose.

Again, these are errands for fools, but of course
fools speak louder than thinkers and rule all but auspicious places, those private lands
governed by men who will tolerate no more,
who instead choose to stretch themselves out before knowing
and learn what the gods have in store.

The beatings continue, morale doesn't care,
and one wonders how punishment ever was thought
to cure suffering, or how anyone stands it.
But stand it they do, if they must.
Deeper silence where agony once named a people.
How now to take heart and oppose this new ocean of troubles,
or else turn to brooding for future's sake?

I sing from the belly of the whale,
which pursues its perfection for all,
which leaves open no quarter for others,
which swallows each culture in all,
which cares nothing for time past or future,
whose whiteness is barely a memory,
whose grayness is given by all.

With the hour both hidden and late,
I cry out for the sea-foam to hear me.

Emerge

11 July 2022

In America, we know God changes his mind. We oblige him with all of our talk about time
and Democracy. Where, after all,
does one find something permanent.
Surely not here, where we bind ourselves freely to change, and await the next Mind, with its talk about how all is fine.
But ennui is outdated, and we feel confined by ourselves
and our origins, soaking with brine, emerge fresh from the foam to remind us
how we know God changes his mind.

Industrial Man

21 July 2022

When I survey Industrial Man
in his anxious glory, his endless competitiveness, I still doubt that his station is final,
that any part of his nature is fixed.
If by now one knows not to assume that the spectre of Progress can save us,
perhaps we can doubt, too, its wrath,
which still animates workers,
machine-like and futile,
in cities all over the world.
You have heard this before,
but my question is different.
It grows from a deeper uncertainty.
Reason defies observation. The chaos is plain, and our planning has ended
in time. So the wrath can be doubted, the wrath of the godless mind-in-the-sky
who defies observation, whose wrath
is our animus, naked and pure,
like the God of before, without love,
but that wrath drives its heart I am sure.

There is something uncanny about reality,
sitting out there in the ether,
like a renegade neighbor,
the kind that can never be trusted.
Reality, too, can surprise
even those with the best educations.
I wonder what more it will say,
once the moss has grown over broken traffic lights
and deer play through shattered parking lots.
It likes these places best, because less resists it there. Even here, where traffic flows,
I can hear it call like the sound of bird-shot through tin, the eccentric neighbor
readying himself for adventure.

The machines never sleep, nor do we,
being imitators of our environment,

and somehow we have to compete,
feeling threatened by gadgets
that do it all better than we can,
and so we assert our own dominance whenever we can. Apes that shoved one another to the mud, the slow
endless endeavor to be king of the hill,
on a hill now maintained by machines
bred by science in underground labs...
Why is there no more sunshine here,
in our minds, where in earlier times
gentle breezes brought birdsong to bear
on a plant's slow endeavor to blossom?

Liberty and Justice

11 July 2022

Someone should tell New England
that God has not made up his mind
about how to best organize life,
nor should we, being free.
But why freedom? What do we achieve in that ecstasy known by frontiersman,
and by them alone? The achievement is justice, though fleeting it be,
and it is not your grandfather's justice.
Then liberty, justice, and us here and now,
in the swirling of time, decide once and for all (not for long) how life is, what it is,
and shall be. But how free shall we be?
Free enough to revisit these questions
posed back at the start, and all answers so far,
with an eye to revision, but not revolution,
assuming no violence is warranted, knowing that violence can never be totally barred,
for it comes from a failure to question in depth and in time. So let's question. Thoreau may have been on to something, and so we may be,
if we ask ever deeper what meaning dwells here,
where we are. What is Liberty? Why it and Justice?
Could either be without the other?

Near Mountains

11 July 2022

When I consider the electrical wires,
the works of our hands, and when I consider
the cars, and the buildings made of steel,
I ask, what is God that we are mindful of him?

You will think I am being facetious,
but surely these things are our gods.

How have we gone astray? Is it maybe that no one is driving the ship, that our voyage,
once rudderless, must now be captained?
Or is it that someone is driving, and driving badly,
and therefore the crew must resist?
Or is it that both have been tried and retried,
such that now we no longer know which to try?

I suggest thinking harder, and longer,
in some place more tranquil, near mountains.

Reasonable Measure

16 July 2022

At the end of life's journey
I awoke, not aware yet
of where my road had taken me,
but brightness lit my mind up
like a flame. I'll never be the same.
Discursive Reason failed us. Here we wait for some new measure to make chaos something straight, without demanding that it wear the guise of form.
I beg to differ, if by differing
I bring new thoughts to table,
and as far as I am able,
guide our way. But beggars all would trade their place for one in heaven, yet to me that path is barred,
so I use reason in new ways,
feet deep in earth, head free of daemons,
closing in on what it means to be here now,
where I awoke, at journey's end.

Across the sea, I glimpse an image,
be it shade or beast or otherwise,
I only know its visage.
But it calls me with its message,
like a work of human craft.
I say, deception is insidious.
I tell this lonesome image
to release my gaze to this shore,
where I make my only home.

But what home is, I cannot say,
nor can this homely image tell me.

Socrates and Confucius

16 July 2022

In Persia, some say the great thinkers
once met on a precursor to the Silk Road.
They discussed how things change and how some stay the same, legend has it, but most they discussed
how beginnings occur, both well-versed in this,
one saying History, the other Rationality.
Neither equipped to dissemble his equal,
they talked after dark, in the desert
where lately Zarathustra laid waste to the mind.
Who can say now what echoes remain there,
or which will endure?

Theodicy

16 July 2022

The Nazis proved that God's law
can be violated with impunity
for a time. It was, after all, America who stopped them. God was mute.
And if there still be any who would claim that Auschwitz fits some higher plan,
I say I do not wish to serve such Planning
or a God who makes such plans.
With this, I often wonder if Herr Hitler has his final laugh,
for though, of course, we beat them,
one long draught of their Nepenthe
has us losing our identity.
They proved that God is silent
in the midst of desperate anguish.
Who believes now that he listens?
Do the screams not matter much to his big mind? But let us alter here, and ask God what he is. We may be wrong without discarding years of questions. We may ask without demanding certain answers. We may think without deciding in advance. Must God use reason? Why?

Who are they?

11 July 2022

They have built all our highways.
They change how we think.
They've invented vaccines.
But who are they?

They've improved understanding.
They've conquered the moon.
They're enlisting our help.
But who are they?

They speak in equations.
They think like machines, and
They dream of control.
But who are they?

Aletheian

31 August 2022

Some do not wish to join the project of empire,
even after all these years. I shall call them Aletheian, to distinguish them from Roman soldiers eager for command. They rather seek what's hidden in the inner world of things, a world forgotten in the mad rush for imperium. But be things as they may,
these few are hidden, too, unnoticed in the roaring crowd,
the crowd as blind as ever, and no less so for their service.
Oh, the Aletheians have endeavors too, like maybe breaking through the cycle of hereditary bullying, which, for Caesar, would make servants of us all. But serving whom?
But more than this, these simply watch for signs,
believing that a god, or something, speaks
and can be heard. I like this last pursuit
a little, and much more than I like empire.
I think I am just half an Aletheian, and part Roman,
but would like to be much more. I dare say you,
dear reader, many years from now, shall be much more.

At Sea

31 August 2022

Once in awhile, despite expectations,
you run into someone who knows what they're doing.
Surprising in times like this, but then also familiar, as if in response to a call that you heard all along. It won't last,
but for that moment you'll know what it means to be human. For that moment, all small uncertainties crystallize into a sculpture of rain,
the most precious made permanent at last.
But time chips at it, wears it away
like a vandal, adolescent, without shame.
You thought maybe it could be like before,
when the stars spelled out stories of heroes
and mankind obeyed and endured, but time had other plans. And then slowly a new thought emerged, not quite visible, but certainly there like a ship in the fog or an iceberg or some other sculpture. You thought, is this mine or must I wait for another? It has been so long since the last one, you thought of absconding whatever the terms. But this is not your ship, not your voyage. Your journey is here, where you are, on this ground.
I had better remind you that ships come more often now, maybe the old way of choosing won't do, or at least, won't suffice.
I must know where I stand, on the prow
or on land, but in either case, these legs will do.
So will yours. On the ship, watch the seamen so proud and hearty, assured of their artificial discipline. Of course this is mastery, of course this is justice, of course, of course.
But the course is precisely neglected, already decided,
not open to question. On land there are always new flowers. Who we are is never so certain.
I like the land better, although I think men
do learn something at sea, to tame chaos,
a Faustian bargain if chaos is in us,

if taken too far, but a call from the sky
to those drowning in worlds without form.

Craftsman

20 August 2022

The craftsman in this body
(not the one above the stars)
devised this poem. Would you know him?

Feet of Rain

31 August 2022

You learn the way but the way changes.
You walk with feet of rain.
You fear the changing more than the storm.
You sink while looking down.

That is one way of doing it,
but others press in from all sides,
demanding a show. You hesitate, not being a dancer, not being
at all. The way is through the rain.
You think you have heard this before,
but the words change. Why won't they stay still? Why can't they remain?
They are not, that is why, and they never were.
The rain moves through the way...

Hitler's Bunker

31 August 2022

Americans closing in, after ravaging much of Italy, I wonder, did any ask, "What have we done?
What rubble becomes our heritage?"
If any living would know themselves,
I counsel reflection upon these years
when fascists strove to make Rome stick for all.
But now the rubble (no more storied columns, monuments of power believed), becomes a doom.
Destruction has a new allure, the fasces
christen every room, and man no longer wills to be alone. It is the total will that governs even "freedom-loving" people. Where is safe?
There are still mountains, true, but mankind cannot thrive outside the law, and in our time
the law abuses some for fun.
This must be known if we still wish to be made human. Both hard sides of contradiction must be grasped and known.
We need the law. The law abuses.
If there be an easy answer, I don't know it.
This I know: some govern well, but others
move within the doom of Hitler's bunker,
where all hope is lost, the only option death.
Be not like them, consumed by hate,
nor hating them, for then hate wins,
but neither drown in naive love, for man
loves dominance most, for reasons unknown,
and this will never change. Carve out a home away from man's cold quest and rule it well. This is called happiness.
One wonders that the Hitlers could not find it seeking total domination from the bunkers of the world.

Lady in the Rain

31 August 2022

Evening mistful after rain,
I saw a woman's perfect form,
no halo, but a song fell from her lips.
She said to hope again,
and all was like the rain.

No, it was not a dream,
no journey through Lothlorien
could pass this way,
though she draws from that well,

And who's to say just which
of us inhabited the other?

Mingled Being

31 August 2022

What is it that calls for children?
Why do women weep to see their offspring leap through flowers? I suspect it is like that which summons poetry,
what one has called "the unreserve of mingled being."
Hear now how the many voices speak
of loved commeraderie,
as though this be essential to their frame.
I do not know what calls if not enticement to the game of mixture,
turning one and one to something more.
The dance is waiting ere we learn it,
blending what presents with what we are.
So travel cautiously. Beware the swamps that pull things down. Avoid the soggy groundless ground. Instead recall the energy of youth, and how your mother wept.
They were not tears of pity, no, of joy,
to see herself in you, of you, with you.
And mingled with you, Being, in its full array of flowers,
alive to tell.

20 August 2022

On this rock,
I have placed my insignia,
placed it where all can see,
as a warning against what has been
and an omen of what must still be.

On this rock,
I explain my old purpose
in words not yet known to most people,
to teach and explain what we're doing here,
lost as we are on Promethean shores.

Such Surprises Must Be

31 August 2022

The way scientists mishandle surprises,
you'd think they were born in a lab
with all variables controlled, where the mother
deduced from first principles that a good time had come.
They go on to the end of surprises,
but there is no end to it, no world
of babies by babies for babies.
Can anyone handle the unrest of history?
Nature has laws! they will say,
thus forgetting that emperors need not obey.
So who then shall be emperor?
I'd vote for one who rules justly,
loves mercy, and cares for his country as his own,
one who knows with compassion
the suffering drawn from surprises,
and that such surprises must be.

The Ground is Lava

31 August 2022

Late one morning, I ventured
to know myself, like the thinkers demand,
but before I had gone through the threshold,
I saw that the ground had returned to primordial soup.
As I gazed at that chaos, I thought of how children
pretend that the ground becomes lava.
How wise they are, unlike ourselves,
who pretend that foundations are solid
in order that we might erect some grand edifice.
Children know well that foundations are fluid,
and that we just do what we can.
Ask the children how much they believe,
or, importantly, why they believe.
I suspect they have far purer reasons.

The New Frontier

02 August 2022

"It is and it is not, and, therefore, is"

- Wallace Stevens, A Primitive Like an Orb

What have we learned in seventy years?
What are the lessons of that war
which lately ripped both Europe and Asia
to pieces, that broke our faith, but left us here?
If God is dead, what takes his place?
Or must the place itself change, into something open, free for exploration, undefined?
It is, is not, and therefore is,
just like ourselves, our lives, and our surrounding aura.
Who would dare to pin things down again?
Yet how could beasts like us survive
without restraint and limitation?
We have known the pain of man and his machines
on heaven's throne, have suffered Cromwell's vengeful reign for nigh four centuries. This war (the one succeeding, recall, the one to end all wars) is but the climax of the heavenly interregnum. But what person dares to sit on such a throne again?
Are we so human? Human still, despite our deepest cravings, loyal subjects to an absent king. Why can't we let God rest in peace?
We hear the wind disturb the leaves, those covering his grave.
It's us, the ones you chose to save,
and then abandoned to the formless blur,
which is, is not, and therefore is.
Let's on with it, then, to the new frontier,
where our longings are answered more plainly
and with less fear.

Thinking Deeply

31 August 2022

I have been to the place where truths are born, I have heard
the sirens call me there,
but I rarely return. It is dark there,
and cold, and no homes endure
the hard swirling of winds.
But I'm still thinking deeply,
traditions in mind, because
this is the only way to think.
All else is chaos breeding chaos.
But stiffened traditions expire,
a new generation arises,
and all that is left to the thinkers
are keen ears for cold winds of change.

Too Playful

31 August 2022

The poem grows from the same place
as child's play, the soil of human possibility.
What can we be? Maybe doctors or lawyers or dragon-slayers, or maybe plants or gemstones or rye. But children grow older, and most forget play, though its lessons stay with us, for
we are our playthings, we are what we play,
and at one time you knew that.
I write to remind you, though it is no use,
because patients are sick, because clients are angry,
and dragons are burning down villages, but you are too busy to play with me. If only you knew that your play is play too, we'd grow wiser together,
and maybe you'd learn about truth
and its too playful hold over you.

Afterthought on the Romantics

21 September 2022

They strove to bring the dark into the light.
What evident folly, yet an understandable urge to see the dark, there, always. It is there, but it cannot be seen. It is the absence of sight,
a lack of presence. To make this present is to hollow what remains. Instead, we now learn how to build, with subtle lighting, some cool nave
of stone, where light and shadow interplay.
This way we can keep both, and keep them well.

Gettysburg

September 21 2022

Before the dawn one evening, I went down
to Jackson city, to remember why we here
do not live there. It was a cool miseducation in the ways of segregation, but it was not what those elsewhere like to say. I saw a people, many hungry, some devoted, some misguided, one or two with hope to spare – in other words, they were a people like the rest. True, they owned slaves, or those before them did, but this fact cannot be washed away with any amount of blood. We ought to know by now that history is fickle, and remains despite our sternest glare.
There is no way to make it vanish. Nonetheless,
we can move forward, and have done it, though with golden thread to bring us home. Have you observed
how every poem stacked in order waits in reserve?
They are like people under the lash of cold machines.
Our words have suffered. They have lied to you, although they had no choice. The words are not the problem, though they are a symptom, and I hope by now you know the disease. I am at ease to write,
it's true, but we are not at ease while living,
and eternal life makes us less easy still. Before the dawn, consider what can still be spoken, and,
more troublingly, think what can speak no more.
It is the silence calling us this time of night.
Beware the apathy of drowning in the noise.
I hear the call of many chain-gangs in the wind.
I hear their rattle, and they will not be ignored
but seek no vengeance. They would like to sleep again and be released at last from pain. Could we oblige them?
I think so, though it would take a serious effort
and one not like what we've dared to try before.

--

I do not believe in Lincoln. I cannot.
He was a feckless Hegelian, couched in Biblical tones.
He did not govern well. I've said it and will say it again, he cowed to violence, could not admit that states wished to secede. Oh, what a sneaky devil, blind in the face of the obvious. There is no forthcoming millenium where all peoples of all colors live as one. De Tocqueville said so. Yet we try and try and try. I do not know what else we could try, but we at least could notice the obvious, that humans are still human despite the violence. We are here, as we have always been, as prone to hate as love. It will not change. What wars are necessary to teach this once and for all? I fear the answer as I fear the blight of winter.

--

Why am I here, able neither to remember nor forget? To absorb solemnity left by dying men? Or to be thoughtful about how little we know? These men, brave men no doubt, died hard, but why? Should we dare also to die? Again? But why?

--

Had Freedom died? Or was it just then mortally struck? Why was the new birth necessary, and could it be needed again? And needed by whom? I may digress, but you would not forgive serenity at a time like this, when lady liberty labors to bring life into the world. Would we, then, also be reborn? Some time ago was one, and yet another, who spoke hauntingly of birth. Where have they gone? Where have we gone? I think old freedom lives and could not be reborn, for it was never born. It merely is, beyond the pale of all that ever comes to womb. It merely is, on its own terms, in its own time. Say Lincoln knew this. Likely he'd forgotten, like most others of his day, but say he knew it. Could we have a greater leader? Could mankind then rise past folly after all? Just say he knew it. Say he knew it for the scores of years of bloodshed we've endured. War is not pretty, no, but neither is our peace. The fools immortalize his words, against the wishes of those very words. I'd have this plaque removed, along with all the noisy monuments, and rather listen closely as the ghosts here tell their tale.

Old Flames

12 September 2022

As I sit, I remember the point of the story,
the struggle to keep out the cold.
It was always getting colder, no matter the weather,
and we, like frontiersmen, built houses and fires
to keep ourselves warm. But the houses grow old, fires dim, and the embers are hardly remembered.
I say, as I sit, I remember those embers,
how long-dwindled fires once burned in our hearts,
or if not in ours, then in our grandfathers' hearts.
But we are the ones who are here (they are not, or may be but are not as they were), yet their embers remain unremembered. I think that is sad, but not new.
As I sit, I remember a time, and another,
when history was not remembered. I will not give names,
but you likely know that this is true.
There's a cold wind breathing at the door.
It's for us, and against us. I think we do well to remember it. Even the best insulation will never make heat. We will need a new flame.
We must ask where the old flames have gone.

One of Us

12 September 2022

The veiled criticism always says
how dare you not be one of us.
Yes, be yourself, but first be one of us, of us, of us...

I cannot do it, not with thirty legions,
not for all the world.

12 September 2022

How many voices drown in that wind,
unable to make it across?

Sandcastles

12 September 2022

I am watching the children build sandcastles.
I know they won't mind, though I think they will wonder what keeps me away. I am not one to join where I know that the wind and the waves will destroy.
But I do not mind watching. Sometimes their achievement is marvelous, but I cannot silence
the sound of the crashing waves. It's like time, you know, after a long day, when the quitting bell rings.
That bell rings for me always, and over such noise little castles of sand have no hold. I don't mind, though, watching, and sometimes I wish I could join them.
It would be like hope, you know, after a long doubt.
But I cannot shake loose of the grip of the sea.
I will watch these new sandcastles fall, like the last,
and leave only some footprints behind.

All Silence

14 October 2022

This moment I'm writing to you
as a man who has lived to see death
not in morbid obsession but only in rapturous reality. Yes, it is true,
there are things and not just me and you.
Answer softly, my sweet, when I ask you to be near me now as things fade.
We are dying as sure as we're living.
But listen for me past the hearth flare, in chill air.
I wait for you there in all silence.

As Ever

14 October 2022

We no more renew the song
of time wherein by masquerade
the "mortal dross" transforms into eternity. No more! We live, as ever,
in the flowing, thingly river, day
by day dissolving in new ways
of speaking thought, and so we ought,
if time has brought us here, if time itself
would like to bring us near.

No Reason

25 October 2022

Many things happen for no reason.
We dare to admit it now.
The future, hazy, approaches.
We hold a wet finger to the wind.
It answers thus: mankind unfettered,
the child a universe at play.

Risible Time

25 October 2022

Born against odds in a risible time,
thou shall rise, as thy parents
before thee did rise, and shall fall
up and back to that risible sky,
with it's empiest center, near time.

Time

14 October 2022

Walk here on this beach with me,
where time is, in the evening of its missionary gaze, the goal to save all who will hear. Walk here with me,
where gods can die, and often do.
Walk here, but slowly. Know these waves,
the ones you've learned how not to hear.
You'll hear them now, so gently falling down upon all things. So time falls, so it goes,
and so we go, into the crypt of time,
where all days are reborn, are born, and die.

After Tomorrow

04 November 2022

I remember from time to time
how those moments when humans
are worse than isolation resolve into moments when all one can do is sit quilly, staring off into tomorrow, as if it won't also be much like today, and I wonder what happens the day after tomorrow
when all of us wake up anew.

It is not for me

04 November 2022

Here they are, as ever, making the weaker argument appear stronger, uneven in thinking, so tipsy in mind. What great folly, if even the end of historic progressions or else the result of some King's stiff command. We are tired by now and its restlessness, drawn to all corners of the imagination by a call no less real than a fairy-tale and no more real than the earth. It has drained us of every ambition, but this is no reason to scream, no, the screaming is part of the problem. I ask you for once to be ruled, if you will, if you can, but it is not for me that I'm asking.

No Entry Beyond

29 November 2022

We are free now after long bondage,
no longer seeking to mate with the Truth,
but instead care to know it, as thinkers,
not lovers. I dare say this was a very long time in coming, not empty
but full, at long last, of ourselves
and our families, countries, and tribes.
We are full of reality's emptiness,
brimming with void, and in love
with each other, as passion demands.
We are free, very free (can it be?)
We are wise beyond years, beyond tears,
beyond ghosts of some greater beyond
who no longer hold any sway here.

Thing in Progress

29 November 2022

I shall pull back the curtain,
peep under the veil, at the thing
in its progress. It is not done yet, and yet is the progression in it or in me? This is by now old music.
We may do more asking for origins.

The Gospel According to Us

29 November 2022

If you'll listen, I will tell you
of the day before the stars were born
like yesterday, but more in tune with now.
This is the gospel according to us,
not some forgotten fairy-tale
from days gone by, but this here now
by us for us. This is our gospel, by the power of consensus, reigning free
across America, where we decree
what each thing is and dare
no other. We have tasted majesty from sea to shining sea, now dare
to speak, and be not worried
if this flag speaks not for thee.
We'll make it speak, with every fiber
of each being, named by us
and therefore there, existing solely for ourselves, who, speaking, make the world
of images derived from prior times, the sea
of echoes pouring through our lives
as history. Are these not also here, informing things? Are we so free that each decree becomes a law?

Untested Ways

29 November 2022

I am wondering what will become of us, after all this time. I am wondering just how strange time is, and how strange
we are, living here, at the end of it.
We're aware now that Jesus never attended church, so we follow his footsteps
at last, but what of it? I suspect there is more to this story, and until we get down to the bottom of it,
I wonder if we will find peace.
There are many paths forward, but each
is a severance from what precedes.
This is saying the road does end here,
but some new ones begin. I think I shall explore a few untested ways,
for your sake, and for mine. This way,
one of us at least keeps moving.

No Will to Deceive

29 November 2022

God has grown neurotic these last few centuries,
ravaged by ships sailing seas where no ships had dared dream before, but this is nothing, just men chasing power, yet power is what makes God go. Are we listening now?
I remember, I can never forget, how the days before ours
were like fire in the night, but the night lasted longer and swallowed that flame. We're the same when we ask for forever, though knowing full well it's beyond us. Where we live time reigns, and the best we can do is believe. I can only remind you again and again, but I'll do that with grace in my heart and no will to deceive.

Uncertain Times

29 November 2022

Lincoln roamed over
the cavern of godlessness
like a leader
in uncertain times.

After "A Late Walk" by Robert Frost

29 November 2022

My walk is later, yours
is later still, the animus the same,
no time until we reconcile. This winter carries history, this harvest has a name (it's you). I warrant that the aftermath dishevelled all of truth.
But there's no matter, so they say.
Who'd even try to go some other way.
Perhaps a strong-voiced bird will rise
and sing another day.

Freedom's End

29 November 2022

I stand upon a precipice,
the great cliff white as snow,
and fear a darkness coming yonder
over fields we used to know.
The day is cool and feckless,
but the night is coming in,
and we are hungry, we are tired,
by the gravity of sin.
There are no words between us,
no embraces bring us home,
and in the darkness I descry
the end of all things we have known.
I am no meager prophet,
and this is no meager poem.
I believe in new beginnings
grown from darkness overgrown.
So take this next step with me.
Through the doorway we will wend
and walk along the newfound pathways
on the way to Freedom's End.

Persuasion

29 November 2022

It is strange how our rulers
pretend to believe that they serve us, as though we don't know that each offering merely entangles us more in their web. Still we go on, each feeling prescribed
by the business of business,
but free! we are free! very free!
If that is what we call it
to be inauthentic or else.
Who could want any service
besides what is standard?
I tell you we could,
with a bit of persuasion.

Darkness Becomes You

29 November 2022

In darkness I am reaching from a still place, in this empty space for you, whoever you are. It is not clear that we are here, but in these moments darkness becomes you, and I can see that after all is said and dreamed,
there is a silence and its teaching.

History

29 November 2022

It occurs to me now and then
and from time to time that our role
must be: preserve the living and keep out the dead.
This is history, this is our role in it,
let us respect and partake of this process.

Crimson Days in the Depths of Time

29 November 2022

Into the sea he dove, toward another land,
this one no less deplorable, unneutered, never filtered,
and he swam. The currents pushed and pulled his form,
and twisting, writhing, he found sand, the stuff of mountains long eroded, then descended. Were these not the sands of time, at last, now freed here from their hourglasses?
Time would tell, as only time could tell.
And so he fell, but falling, not as out of Eden,
rather falling as one drawn to depths by kinship
to those depths, or maybe drawn by some dark gravity.
Leviathan in chains, he feared, would wait for him down there,
or so they say, but on this day he little cared
what fate awaits him, little cared for self at all when put against the call to sink or fall below the waves.
In crimson days, in patteredened waves, he feared the rise of troubled years, nor dared to counter them with tears,
for they demanded something more, a new beginning,
if a new path could be won, and so he dove
to chart a course, lay some foundation. He struck rock the second time, this not surprising. He had heard of rock before, though never seen it.
These he saw, and knew at once that they could serve him. He delved hard, and threw himself against the rocks, and when few broke, he knew again
that these were firm. But when he moved them,
when he placed one on another, both proved worthless,
turned to sand. He groaned, but, still resolved, took sand and pressed it in his hands, until as glass it stayed.
He now had made his way, and none could take it,
so he claimed, but came a rumble from those depths
of things forgotten, drifting memories of all that sand
has been. This troubled him, his glass was cracked, but there could be no going back. He cut his hands there, leaving drops of blood reflecting throughout time, and though those depths had proved unkind, it's said that he still loves them, like a child, like a patriot,
to the end.

In Any Case

29 November 2022

Those with the higher sense, who observe our way of life,
can only say "it's all wrong" so many times before they go crazy, so most just stop saying it. But none can stop feeling it. Why, after all, make things permanent?
Process is all, and the process itself is in process.
Or am I repeating something said before?
I am certain that this much is true, we know little, no more than our forebearers, and we all know how that all ended (or have we forgotten?) In any case,
let me remind you that change can be friendly,
but so can the law, so we'd better plant one foot in each.

Ave Maris Stella

29 November 2022

Stella, bathed in lapis, azure
waves of sky, pray tell me
whence thy rays of amber light?
Am I your child, or am I self-made, as prophets say
who guide our way tonight?
If any be whose thoughts are free,
I say they well may think of thee
yet still be free, but more to those who find some thing objectionable inside,
I write with hope to change their minds.

Why Reason?

29 November 2022

I have come to you, naked like this,
in the death throes of God, being pregnant with words and with meaning,
to answer your question with another:
Why reason? To make ourselves stable?

Hegel

29 November 2022

What did they do to you, Hegel,
to make you so blue and somber?
Perhaps they withdrew when a staying
was due, or perhaps they demanded the truth.
It is sobering, isn't it, being here dead
as a log, in these pages, just one more firm concept to break through?

Back to the Mines

15 December 2022

I think sometimes we shall never escape
from the general, all-around clusterfuck (pardon the language, it applies) of humanity always and everywhere, in general confused
about what it all means, about what meaning means,
or why meaning is so indispensable.

Oh well, let's back to the mines
for another long spell of formation through labor.

Why Obey?

15 December 2022

Could it be that for some definition of "we", we must leave on the pathways of time
some beliefs etched on signposts
for others to see?

You Are The Way

15 December 2022

Listen to me. Listen (I will speak) to this beginning out of no-thing (yet not nothing). There no more shall be interminable deductions from infallible first principles, not even if those principles be liberal. We are all that's left, my friend.
The way is you, my friend from afar. You are the way to me.

To Tell This To You, or Changing of the Gods

15 December 2022

I walk out one morning like any other
and come back the same as myself,
for once chosen and spoken for one and no other. I am well-versed in things farmers know, also tech-savvy, and neither thing
will be relinquished, but I relinquish (kenosis)
the past in the present, the future in the imagination. So notice the soldiers, so stiff and so rigid, turn cold to attention, about face, and march
one last time to a palace now vacant, and we,
we are not who we thought we would be. If stars change, I guess we must change too.
I am writing to tell this to you.

Spring Cleaning

15 December 2022

Morning comes, and birds no longer silent fill the air with song. The night was long, but this day comes with cheer. Today is cleaning day, when old mess goes where order comes to stay. It is the only way.
Note how the sky is flushed with light,
new colors wash the old away. I wish for you alive and gay to meet me in the garden. There we'll talk our cares away until the day is spent. I have a special gift for those who only can obey, and one for those who never do. It is no wonder which are you. The moon is rising, and the night is crisp and clear. It is the air that you have been so troubled for, at last,
so clear that one is wondered to the core.

Vortex Afterglow

15 December 2022

In the afterglow of the morning, I walked
to the edge of a growing circumference, never in doubt,
not resolved, but still present, like one from another room,
and I saw there before me an image, but what it portended no words can express. Yet it took me by eye and led into the nearest horizon, that place where the shadows have form and vice versa, and there I saw only my dreams of tomorrow, a fantasy littered with chaos and rhyme. There the sun never set, but stayed stuck in its setting, a sculpture one mis-takes for living.
Soon after the journey reminded of home, so alone
I walked backwards, until stretched by hands unlike mine through the vortex of time to beginnings, as well as to ends, before all as my witnesses ready to go and to find.

Compromise

15 December 2022

The schools are at it again, with their furor
to make a new movement, or else make an old one.
I'll tell you, this will not end well, nevermind
how the old ways have fared. I say clearly,
I want to keep liberty and biology, sir,
and I am not now willing to compromise.

Marxists

15 December 2022

The other day I walked so far
I could not see my home.
The Marxists say such has to be
for any who would roam.

But I remain uncertain, even though they know my heart.
Yes, I remember, yes, I know,
and yes, I still do see the stars.

In Memory

15 December 2022

I open the door. It is not clear whose being-there distrubs my being here, but waves of pure vibrations meet me there. I am a man
one says, another soy un hombre, one je suis etc...
here we are in memory all the same. We differ outwardly, perhaps inwardly too, yet all recall the lessons of teacher who knew something. Open the door upon a field, a pasture, castle in the distance.
Is it home? Or are you longing for another?
What is longing, just be-longing without being?
Let us long, then, till we find a set of beings
we can store within our memories. I'll wait here for you, patiently, recalling what I know.

Elite Waters

17 January 2023

I have dipped my toes in elite waters,
but they proved too cold for me. So instead I am here (I am writing to you)
about love and its answers to questions.

Horizons

17 January 2023

Where did we get the sponge that could wipe the horizon away?
- Nietzsche

From Cromwell it came, with vengeance,
for days were not trusted
as long as a Catholic lived, and with Providence on our side
we strove forth for Britannia,
Science and War side by side.
It was then that the ground
was made firm,
and thus all are now born
in laboratories, laboring, true,
for some queen they know not,
some Elizabeth mouldering probably,
but no true woman. No man of science fares well with a woman, no wonder,
for women require horizons, and science requires the sponge. But no matter, has Germany fared any better, or must we look deeper
and learn of Greek/Roman horizons?

Slumber Much Better

17 January 2023

Again I find myself alone
in the dark, while the Christians
dance madly in imaginary light.
What a pity that all of this suffering goes on unpunished.
I think there will come a time
for licking these wounds, but until then I slumber much better without interference.

Specimens

17 January 2023

Are we to remain collections
of human specimens in the test-tubes
of America, or are we to become men?
And what would that mean?

Wait For Another

17 January 2023

In the aftermath of clockwork decaying,
from prisons of the mind, arise new men
of stone unbroken and yet brittle to the end.
What for? If Übermenchen all, then we are lofty though we fall, for with some hopes
a certain madness lurks in wait. Say more, bon esprit, with less. Do be the best, but know of other figures at the door.
You are no child now, new friend, you grown-old thing,
yet I have seldom felt such shelter from your wing.
Is this, then progress? Or must we wait for another?

Think Not Absolutely

17 January 2023

There's a shimmer on the air, comes flowing over
days and years, to us, who here and now decide to make things clear no more, who think not absolutely, then think pure and free
with obstacles removed, and breath returning.

As Like May Yet Be

17 January 2023

Wordsworth said of a poem:
emotion recalled in tranquility.
Now I say otherwise. Mine
are like ships tossed by storms,
lost at sea, like reality, never
at port in the kingdom of sheep
who fight no significant battles
and want things done for them -- adventurer poems, explorer poems,
as anxious as life may yet me.

Sick With Struggle

17 January 2023

Here we are, still monotheist saints
or else old hoplites with no phalanx,
sick with struggle, and yet knowing of no other...
what voice calls? Is it the morning dove,
or is it just fair Juliet, the wise man's bane?
She has no other name, for she is fair
no longer than a season. All loves end
the same, as sorrows waver, with a whimper,
and mankind remains enthralled to thee,
O time, the muse of all deep divers,
dwelling as you do beneath the waves.

Strangers

17 January 2023

As I sit by candlelight,
I know the strangers of the night
who creep by windows fair and bright
to haunt the streets of all delight,
and all the days of love grown cold,
and all the stories never told,
and all the crying eyes behold
the lying eyes both young and old.
I see them in their shadows waiting,
see their fearful forms debating whether love or lies abating offer respite to their waiting,
whether love or lies can stir
the shadows that have stolen her,
the one whose love was soft as fur
who bristles now with prickly hide.
So come sit by my candlelight.
Come feast your eyes upon the sight
as strangers in the strangest night
sit man and man, sit side by side.

Emptiness That None Can Understand

21 February 2023

We have not proved that life be regular,
only have made padded cages for ourselves
where all is regular. Life remains the same,
a formless void apart from us, so full of mystery
and emptiness that none can understand.

Rest Unassured

21 February 2023

With the shadows dawning, with dawn descending,
I call for you, weeping, alone in the meadow,
with words for renewal. I say rest unassured, be aware but not pure. There are days on horizons not noticed before. As for us, it could be that this setting defines us, but that is no reason to wallow.

Nutrition by Faith Alone

21 February 2023

Dinner options: (1) Take it (2) Leave it
- Local Sign

In America we believe God somehow powers
our food with his majesty, making infallible
all of our culinary experiments.

Call it Nutrition by Faith Alone. All that matters is that we believe, as if no thing has substance,
as if, to use Plato mistakenly, thoughts are more real than things.
But we doubt that, and say so, but know of know other.
I wonder what Asia would think?

Dwindle

21 February 2023

In the midst of plurality, egos must dwindle (somebody tell Whitman) but maybe they need not extinguish.

The Promise of the Lady

21 February 2023

Come to the temple,
the Lady is waiting,
with courtesans towing
the train of her robe.
She invites you to enter.
She patiently gazes
upon your small splendor
but does not refuse you.
Her form soft and slender invites you again
to become what was promised
long since at this temple.

The gateway before you,
your form soft and nimble,
she beckons you and you must go.
But don't worry: her promise is good
and her temple will still stand long after.

Like No Angel

21 February 2023

Wandering homeward, overland
past German towns destroyed
by too-free thought, past English clocks unwound and French hearts broken-hearted, stands a man,
not quite your size, some large American, unsteady on his feet.
He knows too little, feels too much,
but means to help in any way he can.
He feared one day
the old world would cave in and need the new. It never did. Instead it hardened into something like itself, with just a thin veneer of tolerance. And so it wandered, as he too would wander,
homeward, like no angel one had ever seen.

A more tolerant order

21 February 2023

We cannot replace law with tolerance, however much we try. I suggest instead aiming for a more tolerant order, a law that embraces diversity but does not enforce it. For tolerance never puts bread on the table, though lawfulness can, through cooperation (and don't be deceived that cooperation comes through more tolerance). Laws create trust and cohesion but also cause friction where not all agree. It may be that universal laws must be few, but I hope we agree that our mutual survival is something worthwhile, to be cherished.

Night Sweats of the American Dream

21 February 2023

The Radium Girls, the serial killers,
and all night sweats of the American Dream...
how many kinds of peanut butter
does a civilized people need?

All products of experiment,
all experiments neverending,
all the people entertained.

And yet I feel no disdain
for this ship or its sailing,
for as it goes down I go with it.

The Quest for the Immortal Self

21 February 2023

"After all, it is you and I who are perfect, not the next world."
- Allen Ginsberg

Have we found it? I've looked under every belief, and found nothing.
Not even despair, nor ecstatic
self-reformulation (the new dialectic)
can grant this old wish. But I wish that our days were more even, that sunshine and moonlight spoke softly together
and on equal terms. Do you hear?
There are so many hours left, then no more.
This is how it always goes, not enkindled
by immortal flame, but descending in whispers, no longer itself, not the same. But this is not the cause for more triumph, no celebrations here.
Rather, sleep, with its own quiet permanence,
must end each day, most men say,
yet it also begins the next day, fresh, anew.
I am speaking to you, and for you, but you know
more than I can ever say.

The Sound a Plant Makes

21 February 2023

Will any number of plants relieve the pressure?
No, the iron rages on toward tomorrow, restless,
without reservation. Do any remain who hear the moan beneath the steady drone of sure-footed, still uncertain electricity? The moan of earthly things, those things,
alas, that are not standardized, because the earth, alas, is not a factory. Try as we might, it still is what it is, and, troublingly, is what we are.
No number of plants will relieve the burden of care, nor the pain of our carelessness. There is a tight symbiosis of everything, always,
and some humans know that. But this is no
amicable reverie, longing for forgone perfection, which never existed. This is but the next step forward.
We've learned well that nature can harm us,
that not all its processes will be beneficent.
Now we must learn how to pick and to choose
and to nurture those things that sustain us.

I have inscribed some future epitaph,
forged in times of strife unlike our own.
It is a tale of war inscribed on bones
ne'er brittle, by command. These bones speak now, or so the story goes, and yet I weep
for those who militarized the world,
who could not demilitarize their souls.

Ahura Mazda (the Question Remains)

20 March 2023

All hail Ahura Mazda, all hail!
Or fall by the Great King's sword!
I am Cyrus, slayer of nations,
and builder of all that remains.
In the name of Ahura Mazda
I rule over Persia, the land of my fathers.
Begrudge not my epitaph. You also worship Ahura Mazda. If not,
then how do you remain?

The myth of Progress is Ahura Mazda,
The law of money is Ahura Mazda,
The pain of tolerance is Ahura Mazda,
The god of feelings is Ahura Mazda,
Deified sexuality is Ahura Mazda,
New-age bullshit is Ahura Mazda,
The cult of personality is Ahura Mazda,
Democratic Values are Ahura Mazda,
Both you and I are Ahura Mazda,
or else we could never remain.

Socrates versus Ahura Mazda,
the philosophic struggle against all of Persia
remains undecided, though not for lack of trying.
The question remains whether any accomplishment
stands with finality, or whether any question remains.

I disbelieve you, Ahura Mazda.
No power controls the totality of events.

The Throne of Cyrus

20 March 2023

I feel the weight of Cyrus,
feel is pulsing, feel it moving through these very words, within though not without. I feel inspired and afraid. When bones are laid in stone-faced mausoleums, when the Shah himself weeps madly, when the architects
of rule both here and there speak only well,
I am afraid. What fingers clutched the sceptre
as all Persia trembled? Then sang highest praise?
Perhaps the victims of abuse defend abusers,
love abusers, with a love that can't be tamed.
If this be so, how would we know?
With minds beclouded, thoughts well-trained,
we'd sing the hymns of him who put us in our place. True, Greece and Rome have put up manly struggles, to what end?
To place themselves upon the throne?
And what of us? Do we dare disabuse, again,
before that mighty throne?

Come Again

20 March 2023

It has come again, this time
so new, having punctured the sky
I am writing to you, asking why,
and do not even try to deny it,
no, this is here now, here and now,
and tomorrow comes true
if once listened through you.

The Drums of Alexander

20 March 2023

Alexander stood finally tall on Persepolis
burning. This was the vengeance Ionia craved,
the dream of a thousand hoplites realized at last.
But what was that wind? O great King,
have you done this? And had you no doubts?
Later on one will stand here and wonder as you failed to wonder. Were not these baths lovely, with children at play in the spring?
Rubble now, though perhaps all ends thus,
though perhaps not as swiftly as this.
Have you done it, or does some Ahura still haunt these hallowed grounds? What was really at stake, basileus, in so much destruction?
And why do I still hear your drums beating,
louder now, over the Atlantic?

Small All the Same

20 March 2023

Caught up withal in the most divine madness
we crash through the Phrygian stables and lather on filth, with such glee
that no shepherd or pen can contain us.

We crash also through all white fences
on main street, or any street -- crash
as those wild as we are who have seen through the curtain the man at the machine.

What a small man indeed. Shall we triumph,
or are we still small all the same?

Unfriendly

20 March 2023

After all these years one would have thought that deleting Facebook would be easier. After all, it is only a website among many. But strangely pernicious, its popular draw, even buying and selling turned into a struggle for approval (to say nothing of genocide).
What is this pull, which determines so much, means so little. I cannot escape any other way than the old coward's way, or the nobleman's way of thick walls. I can still keep it out, have no fear, but lament that we cannot cooperate. One would have thought this would be the point,
not to lord my success over others, or over myself
lord successes of others, but rather to speak together, quietly, under the setting sun. Until Facebook supports this,
I abstain, and expect next to nothing.

The Realm of Reason

20 March 2023

Have we tired yet of clocks and steamships?
Maybe old Corcyra, maybe Salamis can shake these rusty bones, but maybe not. This realm of reason, sacrilegious blend of Greece with Persia,
shall soon end, and maybe then new thoughts of empire flecked with liberty shall emerge. But is it rather that Hellenic freedom simply can't be suaged? Apollo gives his dictates pure, non-partisan, so irony befalls
those who are partial to Apollo. It's a structural deficiency belying all our thought. Let's think again, with rightful honor paid to Greece, with due respect
for Cyrus, Xerxes, and with half a glance to China,
just to have a fuller picture.

So Very Greek

20 March 2023

It is sad, don't you know, to be living here now
and to know that the runner from Marathon
lost his way, for he founded an empire of thought,
not a tribe of free families, so very Greek was he,
and like no Greek had ever been before... I think Plato would mind being kin to such savagery, such wars
as turn on their victors, devour them, then reign forever.
This is not Platonic, nor Roman, nor English,
but oh it was Greek, was so very Greek indeed.

Larger Accomplishments (Pragmatism)

20 March 2023

Must they be true to be useful, or is it
that laws grease the wheels of society,
giving us form, and through form, giving trust?
Perhaps this is their value, not cosmic obedience to cosmic justice, but immanent trust in each other which leads to much larger accomplishments.

As She Will

20 March 2023

She grasped my hand, and off we flew toward a prior world, with gods yet true.
We turned to you, and said Remember what was said by those lain hundreds dead
before the sun set sadly on the few who still remained. For here was Greece, where once a Lady clothed in stone
called forth at Athens for all Greeks,
and here was Ch'in where that same Lady pulled her maidens to the River.
Know their stories if you dare to live as long as they
and burn forever after, but take care that you do not become too loyal, for she comes in many guises, as she will.

Not even sure who to ask

20 March 2023

Even the clock on my HVAC
adjusts itself automatically, like some divine conspiracy of old, but these gods of technology want us to keep life ship shape, want each detail aligned with some higher design of pure reason. Whose reason? We ask now pathetically, not even sure who to ask.

Saving Daylight

20 March 2023

When is there an end to it, the wailing drone of time, the fleeting hours, days or seconds of our lives, the nonstop blow of death's lone foghorn? Not in this life nor another. We must live among the vanishment, and live as best we can. But does it not belie our hubris that we dare tune time itself for maximal efficiency?

Plain and True

20 March 2023

I watch them working slowly, barely knowing how they serve
the growing tyranny, the urge to please the people, as in Greece so long ago. They are no better, when libido dominandi reigns,
as it does reign, in Europe as before.
But Christian chains could not restrain the beast,
so what hope do we have? Some say more earthbound hopes, like those of China's past,
to give all dignity, a place upon the stair.
No more enslaving, no more liberty,
but letting dialectic rest in peace.
Give each his duty plain and true.

At Eleusis

26 April 2023

Follow these steps, if you dare
descend here unaware, and be made known before a demos that is known. First wander here, then there, but watch! for grasping fingers in the dark. They cannot harm you more than life can harm you. Step here through this opening, join these others, soon
you'll know. Behold! the goddess flies!
She rises from the tomb! It is Demeter, goddess of the corn. Consider how the corn,
with many seeds, may grow, when this plant
sinks below. There is no other way.
Consider well, and be thus nourished,
threefold blessed by life, by birth,
and by their cousin death.

26 April 2023

If he would speak today, the Poet must be modern, must be metal, but he must as well be living. He must vivify the modern soul.

Some Natures

26 April 2023

Some natures are harmful,
despite all theology to the contrary,
and we are responsible for knowing
the good, not the bad.

What time is this

26 April 2023

They are proud to have learned their lessons and never question. I wince in their presence.
I have never learned their lessons. What time is this,
that comes when all are sleeping, like a cock about to crow?

On Whose Authority

26 April 2023

The people demand a show, like always,
but now ever ringing between their ears
growls a question: On whose authority? Whose?

Sources

26 April 2023

No more the uneducated masses,
now the miseducated masses,
squished in one mass by a craving
for universalizable maxims.
O Kant! Father Kant! Hast thou wrought this?
Or must we look deeper for sources?

The Question of Democracy

26 April 2023

The People are not worthy of their servants when those servants serve with honor, when "most people" rule the hearts of men, when servitude is servile and not grand. The People groan at honor, moan for pleasure, lack the common ground which makes men noble, who are products of that ground and of no other. Thus those fight for what produced them while the People (hear me!) claw and scratch the same.

But now what of it? Shall we have another war, or is it simply undecidable, this question of democracy? I say no war can answer what remains so fundamental. But why only Greeks and their inheritors have wrestled with this question is more likely to bear fruit, and bear it soon.

Something About Plato

26 April 2023

There's just something about Plato that led to his preservation. Was it the lofty ideals, or was it simply his extra gear, the secret room of the mind
that would open to him, and him alone?
If the latter, we do well to praise him
but not to emulate him.

Only through turmoil
does genius bear fruit. Many could grow but don't, because peace does not call out for change, only troubles bring change,
only change summons genius, but genius endures. We do well to take care before summoning genius. We may not like what it says.

Who are we?

26 April 2023

The peoples of the Mediterranean
were always pretending to be gods or descended from gods or becoming like gods, and one wonders how far this can take us. If creatures like us act like gods, it would surely destroy us, but if we do not,
then who are we?

culmination

26 April 2023

You would think that by now
we'd be perfect, we've striven
so hard all these years
that no pain could emerge
which we could not destroy,
that with gods on Olympus
surrounded by heroes and victors
of various wars and games
we would celebrate, nectar
in one hand, machines in the other,
but why is this always just out of reach?

The Way of the Night

26 April 2023

Like no one's business, I entered
the place of the skull, on a mission to root out those staining the temple.
'Twas a dark and stormy time in my mind,
but all indications say all is fine.
After some deliberation, prepared for denial and banishment, into the tomb I crept, and was swept
by a wind like no other, from beyond, toward death, but then also toward something outside of death, to some origin speaking through dreams. I believe it was something like truth,
but not nature, for nature cares little for truth, or for us. It was empty, but this was alluring, a void that could drain the false fullness of things,
so I leapt, and some part of me
left me for ever, to wander the shores
of Elysium, or else to die
but to die in a way more refined,
with more grace, with aplomb,
in the way of the night.

Little Bird

26 April 2023

Little bird sings of the break of spring,
new wonders appear, but a soft note
of warning reminds her companions
that some dangers lurk past horizons.

Good Eyes

26 April 2023

I was born sighted in a tribe of the blind,
who, never seeing, are never aware that there are things to be seen. I was born nonetheless, and pay homage for that,
if for little that followed. With my eyes
I've seen man betray man, finding pleasure
in cruelty, time after time, but no wonder,
since wonderful things must be seen.
Would you like me to help with your unbelief?

Untold Misery

26 April 2023

How can there have been so much and be so little remaining? Time with its cup of lethe, panacea,
so they say. But what good is it,
being lost, without even wounds for guidance?

Wallow

26 April 2023

Who can stand them, obsessed with appearing divine, only half aware of humanity or of its frailty,
lost in the heavens pulled earthward
to wallow away from it all.

Duty

26 April 2023

There are those who accept the old Duty
and those who make smashing a Duty,
but where are those moving past Duty?

Some Other

26 April 2023

Upon the way backward
to what Plato meant (it's for you, bon esprit, all for you)
in this desert I stand with no road and no path and no map
and where even the sky is blank
and I wonder what anything means in this way, with myself to blame
or to praise for the barren expanse,
but not satisfied owning it,
searching instead for some other whose cause is as good as my own.

The Protestant

26 April 2023

The Protestant weeps
alone in the corner,
his own priest,
and not a very good one.

Contrition

26 April 2023

I believe we are waiting for Caesar,
although we won't like when he comes.
Diversity often breeds unity,
but by the sword, through an act of contrition.
If Greece, if Rome, if Persia, if England
succumbed to this, what hope have we?
Praise the emperor? Thus keep your head?

The Scientist

26 April 2023

The scientist pauses, haunched
like a cat of the mind, poised for pouncing, emboldened by Truth
which has turned out to be a simple case of precision in measurement. He is ready for mysteries to explain themselves
clearly, distinctly, without hesitation.
But after the clock strikes five,
as he hangs up his lab coat,
a question arises which he is unable to answer:
what are we to measure?
and how shall we choose?

Stop the Bombing

26 April 2023

Amazing isn't it, how easily one now
can say what once got one killed.
But if one or if many rebel, one must ask, to what purpose? If done
as a duty and not mere licentiousness, surely some pause is demanded, or even required. So stop the bombing, so Christ is risen, and so the new faith,
when it comes.

Monotheism

26 April 2023

Will monotheism suffice?
Or must we look under?
Revise the old questions,
discover the author(s) of nature.

Are they One? Or Many?
If many, are they equally wonderful?

Menagerie of Rules

26 April 2023

There are no universalizable maxims,
no fixed rules, no solid ground
which we could bring from place to place.
All rules are local, but perhaps there are good habits, good technique, for those who swim within the sea, that cold
menagerie of rules which never ends.

The Thin Veil

26 April 2023

How many graves will it take before somebody notices? Aye, you will say some have noticed before, but few feel what the dying must feel. Let me tell you, it is not less hostile than life, nor more cold than compassionless love.
You will answer, but I cannot hear,
being rapt by the shimmering veil,
the thin veil that divides men from murder
and rustles against drums of war.

They May Be Right

26 April 2023

I was here before, but did not know it.
Now I know, but that has not made me any wiser.
See the lovers entwined on the beach before dawn.
Unassuming teachers, little did they know that I saw.
But rising beyond them the sea was a formless expanse.
The light broke through the horizon and cracked the surface.
I could not remember who I was waiting to meet.
It was like every dawn in uniqueness, though still being dawn.
As the lovers shuffled I saw ever clearer day coming.
It was and was not meant for them, nor for me.
The shadows grew longer but this time that just felt okay.
The lovers departed before the full sun was in sight.
I have never doubted the feeling that they may be right.

Where They Can See You

26 April 2023

Your feelings may threaten their power,
but always remember that they
once had feelings, before they were monsters,
and could feel again. Until then, remain wary,
and do not cross where they can see you.

Wait, Think, Speak

26 April 2023

Stillborn I fell through the silence of water
past life-forms and fishes uncouth to my eyes
and descended, awakening once more in Asia,
no longer afraid. She was cunning and charming but little did I know she'd tempt me
to give myself up for her dream, that that dream was the flower of five-thousand years. What was I in her thrall? Just a subject of political experimentation, unburdened of freedom, near dead with remorse or from absence of light. I would counter with energy pure from the true well
of Hellas, or if this too sickens, then out of the well of humanity, some substance comes.
And I take it and groan at the weight of it,
knowing though that such is mine, throughout time,
and that only tomorrow will tell what we do here
but I for one lend time my hand and my ear,
and by this you will know me, for this is my sign,
this remembrance of time in its service despite the loud claims that all clocks are manmade and need manual winding. My silence speaks volumes against these blasphemers,
who never could wait, think, or speak.

Banishing Night

16 June 2023

No great poet has ever made a difference,
for he could not have been other than he was.
He could only sing, and by singing bring hope. But no matter. Do suns make a difference, or do they just shine, as if banishing night?

Eudaimonia

16 June 2023

In a room of thinkers, I was quiet, until each had taken his turn. I heard the arguments of Socrates and Zoroaster firmly interrupted by Confucius, who thought he might intervene and end the struggle.
But all any of them wanted was to understand what man is, even Nietzsche, who embarrassed countless Germans, and his protégé, one Heidegger, who smoothed those rougher edges.
Now all thinking ever was was thinking,
this much we endorse, as thinkers,
as the only ones. But what of friends sent from afar? Brought near by ritual?
Is not this eudaimonia?

Some Men

16 June 2023

Some men are born
with insatiable drive
to ascend the mountain of History,
to go to the source of river Culture
and drink her voluptuous streams.

Rolling Waves

16 June 2023

I am going out to sea,
wish you would join me.
It is rough to go alone,
and no fair hands can grasp
the terrors that await those who set sail. But do go with me, and I'll promise you enlightenment
without the heavy falsehoods
of the earthbound ways of man.
I hope you'll understand.
I have no more remorse for life
than dead men have for dying,
but the rolling waves are calling
all the same.

Corporate Man

16 June 2023

It's a god! It's a hero!
No! It's Corporate Man!
Able to leap reality in a single bound!
Able to fulfill all wishes!
Just sign on the dotted line!
Free from the shackles of justice!
Free of all badges of honor!
Who can defeat him?
Not even his mother or father restrain him now!
He is master of both earth and time!
He begets even these exclamations!

Habits

16 June 2023

Where is it going, this spiralling void
of the mind of Hegel, sent Nowhere
on purpose, to dream in some darkened cocoon?
I say off with it, off with the fuzzy delusions of Reason, whatever their object, and on to the habits conducive to honor and hope.

Uncivilized After All These Years

16 June 2023

By the power invested in the personless rationality
of the universal world-spirit or whatever, we wait here
uncivilized after all these years.

Pain That One Calls Home

16 June 2023

We are out here searching for something,
a meaning of some kind, some explanation,
but all that we really needed was in us,
they say, all along. Is it, though? Or are we still adrift in a godless nothing, at last on the verge of discovering forms that administer the pain
that one calls home?

Saying New Sayings

16 June 2023

The Supreme Intelligence in all of its forms must be killed, but then maybe it's already taken a mortal blow, dealt by wizards of German extraction, and some have moved on, some have not,
but how are we to organize friendship in commerce, political life,
or religion, without the old sayings?
Perhaps start by saying new sayings?

Both How and Why

16 June 2023

It is unwise to blame bad sheep for bad shepherding. Where are the greener pastures? Not near the factories, that much is sure, but one also begins
to wonder if shepherds have ever known,
or if they have simply usurped
both the crook and the staff, out of lust for power. But then, some sheep thrive and we must ask them both how and why.

Ideal Republic

16 June 2023

Asia has had no ideal republic,
no city of God, and yet notice
how greatly she prospers. Must we then continue to dream a false city or can we live here and live now and live well?

Flying Lessons

16 June 2023

Soaring bird large and bird small explore sky
both entwined

No Single Force

16 June 2023

I think that we know
very little, that what we predict
may come true, or may not,
that no laws constrain nature,
that nature is plural,
that no single force drives it all.

Dreams

16 June 2023

When I consider the teenagers over the way,
I'm amazed that they have not been disciplined,
growing so free and inviolate, much like I was when I thought men could grow up like trees
and touch clouds. Now I know, as we say, growing never gets old, and all youth is perennial, transferred across generations, but what is this secret? If not the true meaning, how shall we decipher one deeper? The struggle for youth to make good its ambition for harmony shall never die, though we shall. Shall we scold them? I say it's no use, because life is quite able to punish them all on its own.
Let them dream, and let us still remember that dreams are the province of youth, across time, even ours.

Better Judgment

16 June 2023

It is time to reflect, to remember what words have been spoken, to justify all that precedes who we are. It's not easy,
like life, and like all of life's dreams.
But go with me toward it, and we shall be we, not afraid or unbalanced as they,
but as free, we shall breathe different airs,
contra Kennedy, and against our better judgment.

What Surprises Remain

16 June 2023

With a small bit of horsepower,
with little to lose, I have gone
and sublated Hegel, just as he requires, but what, then, remains?
If not Plato or Aristotle, maybe Aquinas?
But these three won't do
in a world that grows tired of λόγος.
Let's try on Confucius,
and see what surprises remain.

Blank Space

16 June 2023

In a field of blank space
a German appeared, out of nothing,
and talked to himself of becoming,
and was not afraid.

28 July 2023

Wouldn't it be nice if we could live morally, as heaven-sent,
not as we are. Would it be nice, to free ourselves from dark places, to glide in the shimmer of light?

28 July 2023

Clarity is like death, disallowing surprises, and hardly the one
to revise what one knows,
what one is, and the tragedy
comes when one little expects it.

Inexorably Ever After

28 July 2023

Is it time for a new beginning?
Have we gone past the great men
and their great trails of corpses,
or do we still dwell in their shadow?

I say time will tell, and she always does tell,
as she will, as she must, inexorably ever after.

Spiraling

28 July 2023

Spiraling, spiraling, into the whirl,
asking what is the value of heaven,
no longer unsure, yet in peril
lest someone acknowledge all mysteries.

This Way Forever

28 July 2023

I have been trying toaster ovens,
and all of them make me sick.
It's a wonder how far we have come.
The design is immaculate, the interface delightful,
the fumes so toxic I could die.
I have been testing toaster ovens
just to find out what I've known all along,
that the smiles of the marketers lie,
that we live at the mercy of industry (never one known for its mercy).
I've been testing ovens like propositions,
but this simply can't be refuted:
I dislike machines and their toxins,
and will not accept
that we have to live this way forever.

28 July 2023

In the depths of it, wondering why the Chinese have still never become good Englishmen (mysteries abound)
and, still further, why Palmerston thought good to try...

Bind

28 July 2023

Wonder, wonder of the mind,
what has we humans in a bind?
If not too-certain categories,
maybe too much wind?

Moldy Thinking

28 July 2023

I can smell disaster ahead,
but nobody will listen. It's like moldy thinking, the kind that has sat in the sun for too long, gazing
stupidly skyward, festering,
waiting to be discarded.

To Even Have a Dream

28 July 2023

What a crazy swirl life is,
when stress subsides, when freedom breathes again. It is like liberty was never taken captive by an empire,
or like spirit never had to stand in line.
But we can't live here, not like this,
not as we are, for we are more than dreams,
we mammals, who need sustenance to dream.

I have known women

28 July 2023

I have known women (I have known them well)
but what women are thinking I never shall tell,
for one dreams of a home as one dreams to be free,
and another is cursed by the blessings in me.
I shall answer with questions and this much avow,
that the life of the living is death anyhow,
but the solitude curses the wanderer fair
with the foul and pestilent, pitiless, bare,
until ragged or richly he comes to surmise
that with women he was at least somewhat prized.
But too late, alas, they have all found their homes,
as he sups with the misers and picks at the bones.

A Raid on Delphi

28 July 2023

We were the last to arrive, and by then
it had all been taken -- the gold, the weapons,
the scrolls -- but how little we knew, thinking
we with our plans could best Fate. Call it Hubris, whatever it was, but don't tell us
to kneel before gods who spoke Greek, even here.
We are here to rob temples whose keepers
have long since passed out of Memory,
brought by temptation or will to power,
to seek restitution for years of disgrace,
but not here. Even here there are ghosts,
where the skeletons slumber for ages,
where rough beasts, awaiting the turn of the wheel,
shriek to fever at mankind's injustice
and roll out new images and gods.

Arrival

28 July 2023

I have been on a journey towards myself,
but how shall I ever arrive (who arrives?)

Like America, I am a mixed breed,
but that is not to say I am formless.

We are all of us formed by each other,
including the others both past and future.

I have been on a journey towards myself,
but arriving is never that simple.

The others have been on a journey too,
towards me and away from me.

I must care for them, since we have formed each other,
and hope they will care for me too.

This is the one who arrives.

In the Field

28 July 2023

As I survey my field, I remember
how last season's crop came up fallow.
The soil has had no time to heal
and the seed is exhausted and shallow.
I know what I have to do now,
though it pains me to look on the barren
and doubt that here ever could grow something worthy of effort. But pain could be pain of new birth, not this field
or this labor, but pain from some far away effort to find a new field and to build a hearth near it where children could play in the morning
and old men retire at evening,
but children would notice the dearth of the field
of the hollow seed, and would surely have questions
as I, gazing blankly at Nothing, remain unresponsive. Oh well, it was nice as a dream, though the field and myself are the same,
although nothing has changed,
I must gaze at it, penetrating
into some essence not well understood or explained,
like an artist, but not like a rabid one,
waiting for what's there to speak. Of this field
I know nothing, hear nothing, and therefore expect to grow nothing. It's always this way
with such fields, which were not well maintained,
though it happens in even good fields.
I do not tell my neighbor what to do with his field,
and I ask for the same in return,
but in my case, I'll know when my field has run dry
not to hope it will grow if I try.

Where it Belongs

28 July 2023

I am coming to the point,
this time for certain. With you standing there, I had simply forgotten
society, lost in your ocean of words,
not yet sure, but approaching it,
waiting for final discovery. True,
you were not one to wait in the past
nor the present, but always going
just one step further, then another.
I never could figure out who you were,
but the message came in loud and clear:
there's a baby asleep in the road,
and somebody has got to remind it
of where it belongs.

The House of the Dead

28 July 2023

He had only begun to understand
when lightning came to slice the branch clean off the bough. It wouldn't matter anyhow without her or the scent of her still lingering
as though to ask a question though afraid.
It wouldn't matter, as all ages past can fail to mean a thing, unlike the scent of one familiar flesh, though this place houses souls.
I ask for a friend what purpose has redemption
after love, for who regrets the love? The pain, indeed regrettable, will satisfy Osiris, who,
by any other name, enlists the dead
into the legions of sweet peril, lost
in strife, lest loss of love revive their ire.
Tell me, Pharaoh, whether any Isis waits
to mock the dead back into living forms?

--

Come again, sweet spirit, to my chamber, whence these dreams enlist the tumult
of the darkened days of man
to find what gems were left behind beneath the pile of burning coals.
Come and wander to the bottom
whence death carries all who dare,
but do take care -- you are not one of them
just yet. I ask your help. This excavation will take years, and we have time to sit and chat
about what might have been. I'll tell you,
there are many things to learn, but few to love,
and by that God who lives above one suffers bitterly,
but what is to be done remains obscure.

--

Perhaps begin by thinking on new avenues,
then stopping to inquire why these structures, why this order.
But do not be late for dinner, which revives you,
like the hero back from Lethe in the dream of old,

for this is where hope lies. We are in chains, it has been said, but now with sun-parched eyes we look again and see
the cave itself in motion, hurling madly through the void.
Will all things be destroyed? And are the chains themselves our safety during impact? How much Freedom does a man need?
And who else could do our work, and do it well?

--

Come let us mock the automatons
and the free spirits, with equal measure.

17 August 2023

In this hour of wakening, what spirit comes to revive even these cold remains? What revival awaits even these mossy chains? Is the sun
to be trusted, or must we learn echolocation?
I've little to gain by remaining unnamed,
except freedom, most untrusty boon, but the path
to formation is wrought with the trials of the hero.

17 August 2023

We were always at war with nature
or in love with it, at all times not seeing clearly nor penetrating deeper than whatever suited our momentary fancy,
but I for one saw her differently,
not afraid to delve into her secrets
even if it meant losing myself.

Leave Me

17 August 2023

At sunset, the birds
call me skyward with songs
made of aether, but leave me untethered.

Westward Ticket

17 August 2023

I have forgone my westward ticket
and set up shop here. It is lonely for now, but that's not the worst thing.
It's not worse than bad company.
Sometimes the owls hoot at dusk,
but I never have seem them fly.
With a little more coaxing, perhaps.

Sources II

17 August 2023

In the dampness, a little resentment
grows colder, untouched by the warmth of the sun, getting older and further removed from the Source. But what Source?
Has this dream run its course, or is thinking
just one of man's fundaments? How could one think without causes of being?
But are there not many sources?

With Great Justice

17 August 2023

We were a people that never did wish to be led,
having known all too well where paths lead and how leaders betray every confidence, sure as we were
that negation was what kept things moving, we struggled to keep ourselves firm. But the sun always set of its own accord, unconcerned with our struggles and even providing false hope for a world ruled by cosmic order. Such hopes were a threat to the struggle and, therefore, ourselves, bent on instituting tyranny of various kinds. Oh how surely we knew what we knew,
having mastered all lessons without even studying,
graced as we must have been with inhuman strength.
But a few in the wilderness still kept their tablets of stone, saying these, or if not, some like these, will one day
restore order in a barren land, because savagery brings nothing new, but instead brings to rubble
the works of a thousand years. The new order, whatever its form, will arise, and decay, and fall.
After all, we are left where we started,
both wary of leaders and craving them, both,
it would seem, with great justice.

All Those Ages Ago

17 August 2023

What was the point of it all,
the mad dash for adulthood, the scramble
for something just over the next hill?
We are here now, they tell us, but where and when, who can say? After all we are malleable still, in the flux
as before, although firmer somehow, but not rigid. No, we are the end of the dream that began when our first parents met
all those ages ago.

Trust or Freedom

17 August 2023

We can either have trust or freedom,
but they are opposed and cannot coexist.
We have gambled on freedom, but whether we're happy remains to be seen.
Whether happiness can be found anywhere also remains to be seen. But perhaps just a little more trust would leaven the dough.

Hitler's Grave

17 August 2023

I went to Hitler's grave the other day,
just off the beaten path, through rows of trees,
the smell of sulphur lingering. It was a quiet place, not oft disturbed, but on the stone I saw
a clump of roses, dying though not dead.
Someone had left them, as if hoping even here in man's best nature. I was touched and yet disturbed, but it occurred to me that Hitler may have liked the smell of roses
or the sun upon his face, as we all do,
and that his favor had not made these things less good,
nor had his crimes. If we but had the time,
we might rehearse his glory and his shame,
but we are fading, through this age into the next,
and soon this grave will not remain, replaced by new ones.
What is left to say? I picked up the bouquet
and plucked the rarest, left that one as a memento,
brought the rest back to the living,
where they may still do some good.

Through All Our Fears

23 September 2023

I have found my way now to the nether regions,
all those dark places beyond all prevailing conventions,
where silence rules and where strange plants grow.
I am writing to you with a vision long seen but just recently put into words. I have heard you are eager for change, but that's what I know well,
and it's never quite what you'd expect. Listen closely.
The only way through is on your legs, with blood
pumped by your heart, which comes from your parents.
There is no deeper mystery than why we abide together,
despite all our squabbling, despite all our fears.

Rapt Futility

23 September 2023

Strange to sit here in the light
while all outside is bathed in night,
and strange to sit, and think, and write,
while others chase utility.

Had you expected something stern,
that each cold strophe would take its turn in chains, for they are English-born in rapt futility?

Surely one knows better now.
It doesn't matter anyhow.
The day that dawns awaits us,
and there are so many things to know.

Walking the Line

23 September 2023

From the darkness, a leader
would sometimes emerge to remind
of original covenants, binding through time,
but I have not the mind to dispute
the dark facts, nor the heart to unwind
the calf caught in the web. No, they come from another direction, the province of vanity, soured by years of neglect in an empire
of vanity chasing vanity. Whence, then, this song? From the light? What light dares to escape the embrace of a vanity
cherished by all in the depths of their souls?
Only this little light of mine, only this,
throughout time, to the ends of the mind
and back here, of this essence, here
walking the line.

That which wants to be said

23 September 2023

No one is happy, nor has one ever been,
and the future remains unpropitious (as Possum scurries back to his hole), but I still stand here
speaking, aware of the Something outside of the Nothing,
to say that which wants to be said.

Kennedy's Peace

23 September 2023

Thoughts go once more to John Kennedy, thoughts that were lost, only here to revive
through abstraction the dream of world peace,
international dream, silly dream in the final analysis,
lost as man is in identities, cages of spirit,
and yet through the din of the bombs I can hear it speak clearly and truly that something has got to change.
Oh, that change never comes (surely never)
which brings peace on earth while men live, 'til men leave it,
but change in our stars has arrived from the east
which may free us for both peace and war.

The peace movement has its Christ
and awaits its Constantine.

A Typical Day

23 September 2023

On a typical day, all the typical people go down to the river to play, the most normal of folk, acting normally, day by day.
But outside of the current one stands on firm ground, with strong legs, and skips rocks
to learn how much the current can say,
and to test its vibrations for permanance,
longing for such, disappointed so far,
one who knows one must learn in this way,
because soon comes a time of the flood,
and somebody must watch night and day.

We Silly Mammals

23 September 2023

It turns out the song
of the stars is out of key,
that no melody wraps all that lives
in a blanket of Reason or gives civilization its name. No,
just we silly mammals, together,
unfolding potentials, discovering holes
in the firmament, forever.

Strangeness of the Ordinary

23 September 2023

I suppose we should thank Wallace Stevens
for showing the strangeness of the ordinary,
though one wonders now whether strangeness
offers a home. Is the ordinary, home?
If it's not, I don't know what it is.
If it's not, is there anything more to say?

Submission in Disguise

23 September 2023

Outer peace demands inner war.
Only outer war and its victory
bring inner peace, in cases of irreconcilable difference, but can any difference truly reconcile with its other (Hegel notwithstanding) or is this just submission in disguise?

Someone Tell Wittgenstein

23 September 2023

Someone tell Wittgenstein that Europe alone
lives inside of the fly-bottle, ravenous for more by design. Whose design?

Through the Horizon

23 September 2023

First day on the job, I walked into the factory, noticed the machines
did not want me, and left. The pay was extraordinary, but ended abruptly
as soon as they saw that some part of myself was impervious to their designs, having been forged by time
and not dreamed in a fit of industrialization.
But what ended exactly? I found,
as the door closed behind me, a new sense of purpose, and tasted fresh salt
in the air, though I didn't look back,
and I'll never forget how the sun felt that first day of freedom, or how it fell through the horizon, like so many times before.

Index

A more tolerant order	174
A Platonist declares	93
A poem	33
A Raid on Delphi	245
A Typical Day	265
A walk through a graveyard	40
After "A Late Walk" by Robert Frost	140
After Lincoln	57
After Reagan	76
After Tomorrow	132
Aftermath	41
Afterthought on the Romantics	120
Ahura Mazda (the Question Remains)	178
Aletheian	106
All Silence	127
All Those Ages Ago	257
Another ending	30
Arrival	246
As Ever	128
As Like May Yet Be	165
As She Will	187
At Eleusis	191
At Sea	107
Ave Maris Stella	147
Back to the Mines	150
Banishing Night	218
Beatific Visions	94
Belly of the Whale	95
Better Judgment	232
Beyond Power	69
Bind	241
Birth	12
Blank Space	234
Both How and Why	227
Child you are the water	31
Clarity is like Death	236
Come Again	180
Compromise	156
Contribution	209
Corporate Man	222

Countrified	35
Craftsman	109
Crickets	50
Crimson Days in the Depths of Time	145
culmination	200
Darkness Becomes You	143
Dreams	231
Duty	206
Dwindle	171
Electricity	82
Elite Waters	159
Emerge	97
Emptiness That None Can Understand	168
Eudaimonia	219
Fading Feeling	85
Far Away	77
Feet of Rain	110
Flying Lessons	229
Fragments Shored Against Ruin	22
Freedom's End	141
Gettysburg	121
Good Eyes	203
Habits	223
Hegel	149
History	144
Hitler's Bunker	111
Hitler's Grave	259
Homecoming	60
Horizons	160
I have known women	244
I have wandered streets	18
I have withdrawn from the world	47
Ideal Republic	228
If he would speak today	192
In Any Case	146
In Memory	158
In the depths of it	240
In the Field	247
In this hour of wakening	251
Industrial Man	98
Inexorably Ever After	237
Inner Harbor	19
It is not for me	133

Kennedy's Peace	264
Lady in the Dark	52
Lady in the Rain	112
Lady in the Temple	53
Larger Accomplishments (Pragmatism)	186
Leave Me	253
Let Go	86
Liberty and Justice	100
Light	87
Like No Angel	173
Lincoln's Memory	54
Little Bird	202
Longing	34
Lost Forest	68
Lyceum	88
Making Sausage	66
Marxists	157
Menagerie of Rules	213
Mingled Being	113
Moldy Thinking	242
Monotheism	212
Mulch by the Scoop	89
Mysteries	43
Myth at Twilight	90
Near Mountains	101
Night Sweats of the American Dream	175
Nixon at the Threshold of the Lincoln Memorial	46
No Entry Beyond	134
No Reason	129
No Single Force	230
No Will to Deceive	138
Not even sure who to ask	188
Nutrition by Faith Alone	170
Old Flames	123
Old House	65
On this rock	114
On Whose Authority	195
One More Cave	44
One of Us	124
Only Begin	32
Out came a cry	39
Over the Atlantic	125
Pain That One Calls Home	225

Perspicuity (For Example)	13
Persuasion	142
Phalanx of Mind	73
Phenomenology of Science	71
Plain and True	190
Planting Time	62
Rapt Futility	261
Reasonable Measure	102
Rest Unassured	169
Risible Time	130
Rolling Waves	221
Romance Revisited	16
"Romance Revisited," revisited	45
Rosie	48
Sandcastles	126
Saving Daylight	189
Saving Earth	74
Saying New Sayings	226
Scents of the Divine	26
Science and Technology	91
Shattered Image, Fallen Breast	70
Sick With Struggle	166
Slumber Much Better	161
Small All the Same	182
So Very Greek	185
Socrates and Confucius	103
Some Men	220
Some Natures	193
Some Other	207
Someone Tell Wittgenstein	269
Something About Plato	198
Song of Sophia	14
Sources	196
Sources II	255
Specimens	162
Spiraling	238
Spring Cleaning	154
Stop the Bombing	211
Strangeness of the Ordinary	267
Strangers	167
Streets I Never Knew	83
Submission in Disguise	268
Such Surprises Must Be	115

Technology	78
That which wants to be said	263
The Bird in the Glue Trap	36
The Choir	27
The Drums of Alexander	181
The Enduring and Unchanging Dao	61
The Gospel According to Us	136
The Ground is Lava	116
The House of the Dead	249
The Lady	49
The man who knows	11
The New Frontier	117
The New Science	37
The New World	38
The Promise of the Lady	172
The Protestant	208
The Quest for the Immortal Self	176
The Question of Democracy	197
The Realm of Reason	184
The Scientist	210
The Secrets of Country Living	42
The Sound a Plant Makes	177
The Thin Veil	214
The Throne of Cyrus	179
The Way of the Night	201
The wind in the leaves	63
The Winds of Change	79
Theodicy	104
There are no words	20
There is too much noise	21
They May Be Right	215
Thing in Progress	135
Things Themselves	80
Think Not Absolutely	164
Thinking Deeply	118
This Way Forever	239
Through All Our Fears	260
Through the Horizon	270
Time	131
To Even Have a Dream	243
To Tell This To You, or Changing of the Gods	153
Too Playful	119
Tradition	59

Trust or Freedom	258
Unauthorized thinking	81
Uncertain Times	139
Uncivilized After All These Years	224
Unfriendly	183
Untested Ways	137
Untold Misery	204
Valediction to Images	29
Virgin Queens	92
Vortex Afterglow	155
Wait For Another	163
Wait, Think, Speak	217
Walking the Line	262
Wallow	205
Wandering Sheep	67
We Silly Mammals	266
We were always at war with nature	252
Westward Ticket	254
What calls for poetry?	84
What Surprises Remain	233
What time is this	194
What we find by singing	64
Where it Belongs	248
Where They Can See You	216
White Shade	51
Who are they?	105
Who are we?	199
Who is in charge here	75
Why Obey?	151
Why Reason?	148
With Great Justice	256
Words	72
Wouldnt it be nice	235
You Are The Way	152